BETWEEN STRASBURG AND BOULOGNE.

CHAPTER I.

THE PRINCE OF NAPLES.

It is well known that on March 1, 1837, the Prince Napoleon ^{came} to the United States in America; and it was on the 1 had been banished from his native country, and against whom the hand of nearly every male member of his own family was raised. His new friends remarked that he was silent, sad, and reserved, but they appear to have been drawn to him nevertheless, and to have felt a genuine interest in his character. From far and wide within the bounds of the United States the author has received letters describing, from personal observation, the Prince's life in America. The testimony is from various points of view, and from men of all degrees, but all correspondents agree that the Prince was quiet and reserved, prone to the society of ladies, and among men, to that of his elders. The following extract from a letter to his mother (April 17, 1837), wherein he describes his journey from Norfolk to New York, amusingly brings out some of the characteristic features of American travelling —

‘On April 2 the captain and officers conducted me to the steamboat that conveyed me to Baltimore, across the Gulf of Chesapeake. We left at four o’clock in the afternoon. There were two hundred passengers on board. The cabin reaches the entire length of the boat. It is a narrow room about 160 feet in length. Supper was served at seven. Half an hour later the tables were swept away and beds were made for everybody. The women have cabins apart. The spectacle of these two hundred beds pell mell in a big room, afloat, and travelling at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, was really a curious one. About four in the morning, being very hot, I got up and went on deck, to get some fresh air. I had hardly reached the deck when I saw a gentleman following me in his shirt, who seemed to wish to speak to me. After having made the tour of the ship twice he at length accosted me. He began with the customary “Very beautiful night, sir.” Then he said “Would you have the kindness, sir, to relate me your history?” I almost laughed in his face. But I restrained myself, and answered that the remembrance of what had befallen me was too painful to allow of my complying with his request. So we talked about other things, and presently, the wind being very cold, he deemed it prudent to get his coat.

‘We arrived at Baltimore at six o’clock in the morning and started again immediately on another boat. At the end of the gulf we found a railway that conveyed us to the Delaware river, where we again took boat to Philadelphia. On the road I made the acquaintance of a young American consul, who appointed himself my cicerone, and of the Brian, brother-in-law of the beautiful Madame Brian whom I had seen at Thun three years ago. From Philadelphia to New York we travelled in the sure way—partly by railway and partly by steamboat. I passed before Point Breeze, my uncle's residence. It is a pretty little house on the banks of the Delaware—but the surrounding country is flat. The only fine features are the width of the stream (since it is agreed that this is a beauty?) and the steamboats, which are magnificent.¹

NEW-YORK, 17 FÉVRIER 1835.

Le 2 avril le commandant et les officiers m'accompagnèrent jusqu'au bateau à vapeur qui me conduisit à Baltimore en remontant tout le golfe de la Chesapeake. Nous partîmes à quatre heures de l'après-midi. Il y avait à bord deux cents personnes. La cabine tient toute la longueur du bâtiment c'est une salle étroite, mais longue d'environ 160 pieds. À sept heures on servit le souper. Une demi-heure après les tables furent enlevées et on établit des lits pour tout le monde. Les femmes ont des chambres à part. Le spectacle de ces deux cents lits pêle-mêle dans une grande chambre, et tout cela naviguant et faisant quinze milles à l'heure, était vraiment curieux. Vers quatre heures, il faisait chaud, je me levai et j'allai sur le pont pour prendre l'air. À peine étais-je monté que je vis un monsieur arriver dare-dare, en chemise, derrière moi, comme s'il devait me parler. Après avoir fait deux fois le tour du navire, il m'aborda enfin et, après la phrase d'usage 'Very beautiful night, sir,' il me dit 'Aimez-vous la complaisance, monsieur, de me raconter votre histoire, monsieur?' Je manquai lui éclater de rire au nez, mais je me bornai à lui répondre que le souvenir de ce qui m'était arrivé m'était trop pénible pour que j'eusse du plaisir à le raconter. Alors nous parlâmes d'autre chose, et, comme le vent était très-froid, il trouva prudent d'aller retrouver son habit.

Arrivés à Baltimore à six heures du matin, nous repartîmes immédiatement sur un autre bateau à vapeur. À la fin du golfe nous trouvâmes un chemin de fer, qui nous conduisit sur la rivière la Delaware, où un autre bateau à vapeur nous porta jusqu'à Philadelphie. En route je fis la connaissance d'un jeune consul américain, qui se fit mon cicerone, et de M Brian, beau-frère de la belle madame Brian que j'avais vue

In their own interest, which could be only commercial, they have separated themselves from the mother country. But a minor who declares himself to be of age at sixteen, let his physical strength be what it may, is but a child. We are men only when we have reached the full development of our physical and moral forces. Now, this country possesses immense material forces, but it is entirely deficient in moral force. The United States believed themselves to be a nation as soon as they had a government elected by themselves, a president and chambers. They were, and are still, only an independent colony. The transition is going on daily: the worm is casting his skin and taking to wings that will raise him. But I do not think the transition will be completed without crises and convulsions.

Locke's constitution could not be used. The population (of North Carolina) were all equals in manners, ideas, and interests. It was one wheel that had to be turned—and the necessary mechanism was so simple that it required neither genius nor complicated forces.

Mon cher Père,—Après avoir passé quatre mois et demi en mer, j’ai enfin débarqué à Norfolk le 30 mars. Arrivé ici, j’y ai trouvé une lettre qui me transmettait votre bénédiction. C’était tout ce que je pouvais trouver ici qui fût le plus doux à mon cœur. J’ai reçu ici bien des lettres, et dans mon malheur je m’estime heureux de rencontrer tant de personnes qui me montrent un attachement si réelle. Toutes mes cousines m’ont écrit des lettres charmantes, excepté Mathilde!

Par le prochain paquebot je vous écrirai plus au long. Aujourd’hui je suis pressé par le temps, et hier j’étais encore malade d’une indisposition qui m’a pris en arrivant ici.

J’ai été malheureux, mais croyez que je n’ai rien fait de contraire à l’honneur ni à la dignité du nom que je porte.

et d'émigrations journalières qui n'ont ni instruction ni tradition populaire, partant point de patriotisme. Maintenant l'industrie et le commerce ont rompu l'égalité de fortune. De grandes villes se sont formées, où l'homme n'a plus à lutter avec le sol, mais avec l'homme, son voisin. Maintenant enfin le monde moral commence à surgir du monde physique. On voit aujourd'hui ça et là des indices que le règne des idées commence aussi de ce côté de l'Atlantique. Parmi ce peuple de marchands où il n'y a pas un homme qui ne spéculé, il est venu dans la tête de quelques honnêtes gens que l'esclavage était une mauvaise chose, quoiqu'il rapportât beaucoup et pour la première fois le cœur de l'Américain a vibré pour un intérêt étranger à l'argent. Il est venu dans la tête d'un parti, à tort ou à raison, que la banque empiétait sur les droits de la démocratie et, pour un principe, elle a renversé l'autel du commerce. Enfin les mêmes hommes qui, par tradition d'Europe, n'avaient jamais pensé qu'à avoir des garanties contre le pouvoir, en cherchant maintenant contre la tyrannie de la foule. Car ici il y a liberté d'acquiescer, il n'y a pas liberté de jouir; il y a faculté d'agir il n'y a pas faculté de penser enfin—qui le croirait?—il y a ici souvent licence et arbitraire. Tant il est vrai, comme le dit Montesquieu, que les lois qui ont fait qu'un petit peuple est devenu grand, lui sont à charge lorsqu'il s'est agrandi.

J'ai été bien sensible à toutes les marques d'intérêt que j'ai reçues. En trouvant Arèse ici, j'ai été bien heureux. C'est une grande consolation pour moi que d'avoir avec moi un si bon ami. Il me charge de vous dire qu'il est bien reconnaissant de l'amitié que vous avez bien voulu lui témoigner. Adieu, mon cher monsieur Vieillard, mon cher ami; je vous aime de tout mon cœur. Je suis heureux de penser que vous parlerez souvent de moi avec madame Vieillard, à laquelle je vous prie de présenter mes tendres respects.

Votre Ami,

by his Strasburg disaster, he was quite alive to the pain he had caused those who were dearest to him. The energy of the Prince is evident in the resolution with which he sought to turn even his misfortune to good account. Scouted by the European press as a madcap prince, he sat quietly at the Washington Hotel, in Broadway, considering the origin and nature of government, and comparing the old world, from which he had been banished, with the new to which he had been borne a state prisoner.

‘I was the first acquaintance, General J. Watson Webb writes,¹ ‘the late Emperor ever made in the United States. It so happened that on the night of his arrival (in New York), an exile, just landed from Brazil, General Scott and some of our most distinguished senators and statesmen were dining with me at my hotel (the Old City Hotel, Broadway). His arrival was reported to me and, at my request, he joined us, and remained until a late hour.

‘I had two brothers in law at the table, the late Rev C. S. Stewart and L. Stewart, and I placed the Prince under their charge—I being actively engaged in political life, and General Scott told him that whom those gentlemen could not make him acquainted with in New York (then a small city) he need not know. On the following day I placed him in lodgings. During the winter I saw him constantly and my brothers in law accompanied him everywhere, and saw him every day—being gentlemen of leisure. In the spring I took the Prince to my country residence in Long Island. Shortly after he returned to Europe on account of his mother’s illness.

‘Very shortly after the arrival in New York of the late Emperor, his cousin—a wild, dissipated, reckless fellow—also arrived¹ He spent much of his time in low resorts; and not unfrequently in the police-station, in consequence of noting, breaking lamps, &c In 1855-6 the press charged upon Prince Louis the recklessness and bad conduct of his cousin; and my brother-in-law, the Rev. C. S. Stewart, who saw more of him in New York than any other individual, at my request, wrote a vindication of the Emperor of the French. Both of our letters were published in the press of the United States in the spring of 1856 My letter was addressed to the editor of the "National Intelligencer," the principal paper published in Washington. . . .

'His bearing when he first arrived, and ever after, was quiet, gentlemanly, and reticent; and I hazard the opinion that he rarely laid aside his grave demeanour His associations were almost exclusively confined to our old families; and he always exhibited a fondness for ladies' society. He also mixed occasionally in a small but refined French circle. I never heard of his having committed any imprudence; and he always sought the company of persons older than himself, and preferred grave subjects of conversation With me politics and government were his favourite topics, arising no doubt from my being in public life'²

The Rev. C. S. Stewart, in his Vindication, has described the life of Prince Louis in America with an authority and an impartiality which admit of no dispute

'The association,' he observes, 'was not that of hours only, but of days, and on one occasion at least of days in succession, and was characterised by a freedom of conversation on a great variety of topics that could scarce fail, under the ingenuousness and frankness of his manner, to put me in possession of his views, principles, and feelings upon most points that give insight to character. I never heard a sentiment from him, and never witnessed a feeling, that could detract from his honour and purity as a man or his dignity as a prince. on the contrary, I often had occasion to admire the lofty thoughts and exalted conceptions which seemed most to occupy his mind.

‘His favourite topics when we were alone were his uncle the Emperor, his mother, and others of his immediate family in whom he had been deeply interested. his own relations to France by birth and imperial registry the inducements which led to the attempted revolution at Strasburg, the causes of its failure, and his chief support under the mortification of the result—“the will of God” (to use his own words), “through a direct interposition of His providence the time had not yet come” He seemed ever to feel that his personal destiny was indissolubly linked with France. or, as his mother, Hortense, expressed it in her will, “to know his position” and the enthusiasm with which at times he gave utterance to his aspirations for the prosperity, the happiness, and the honour of his country, and to the high purposes which he designed to accomplish for her as a ruler, amounted, in words, voice, and manner to positive eloquence. Had I taken notes of some of these conversations, they would be considered now, when his visions of power and earthly glory are realised, scarcely less epigrammatic and elevated in thought, or, as related to himself, less prophetic, than many which have been recorded from the lips of the exile of St. Helena.

‘He was winning in the invariableness of his amiability, often playful in spirits and manner, and warm in his affections. He was a most fondly attached son, and seemed to idolise his mother. When speaking of her the intonations of his voice and his whole manner were often as gentle and feminine as those of a woman. It had been his purpose to spend a year in making the tour of the United States, that he might have a better knowledge of our institutions and observe for himself the practical workings of our political system. With this expectation he consulted me and others as to the arrangement of the route of travel, so as to visit the different sections of the Union at the most desirable seasons. But his plans were suddenly changed by intelligence of the serious illness of Queen Hortense, or, as then styled, the Duchess of St Leu, at her castle in Switzerland. I was dining with him the day the letter conveying this information was received. Recognising the writing on the envelope as it was handed to him at table, he hastily broke the seal, and had scarce glanced over half a page before he exclaimed. "My mother is ill. I must see her. Instead of a tour of the States I shall take the next packet for England. I will apply for passports for the Continent at every embassy in London, and if unsuccessful will make my way to her without them." This he did, and reached Arenenberg in time to console by his presence the dying hours of the ex-Queen and to receive in his bosom her last sigh.

'After such opportunities of knowing much of the mind and heart and general character of Louis Napoleon, it was with great surprise that I, for the first time, read, in a distant part of the world, when he had become an emperor, representations in the public journals of his life in New York (and in New Orleans too, though he was never there) which would induce a belief that he had been, when here, little better than a vagabond—low in his associations, intemperate in his indulgences, and dissipated in his habits. In both eating and drinking he was, so far as I observed, abstemious rather than self-

The Order of Adjournment is read

The Proceedings of Tuesday, the 5th of June, are read

The following Draft Report is laid before the Committee by the Lord in the Chair

ORDERED TO REPORT —

That this Committee was appointed at the commencement of the present Session

The Minutes of Evidence taken before, and Records reported from, the original Committee were referred to us. For purposes of convenience this Report treats the present Committee as though it had been in existence since the appointment of the original Committee on the 11th April, 1933

We record with profound regret the death of two of our members, Lord Burinham and Miss Pickford, and we are deeply sensible of the loss which we have sustained by being deprived of the aid of their experience and judgment in the preparation of our Report

We were empowered to call into consultation representatives of the Indian States and of British India, and we accordingly invited the following Delegates to attend our deliberations —

Delegates from the Indian States

Rao Bahadur Sir V T Krishnama Chari, C I E
 Nawab Sir Liaqat Hyat-Khan, O B E
 Nawab Sir Muhammad Akbar Hydar
 Sir Muza Muhammad Ismail, C I E, O B E
 Sir Manubhai Nandshaukar Melita, C S I
 Sir Prabhaskar Dalpatram Pattani, K C I E
 Mr Y Thombare

Note—The Report as amended and finally agreed to by the Joint Committee will be found in Volume I, Part I.

 Rao Bahadur Sir A P Patil
 Sir Abdur Rahim
 The Right Honourable Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru K C S I
 Sir Phiroze Sethna
 Dr Shafiat Ahmad Khan
 Sardar Bahadur Buta Singh
 Sir Nripendra Nath Sircar
 Sir Purnendranath Thakur Das C I E M B E
 Mr Zafarullah Khan

Delegates from the Province of Burma

Bra Shwe Ba
 Mr C H Campagnac M B E
 Mr N M Cowdell
 U Kyaw Din
 Mr K S Harper
 U Chit Hlaing
 U Hla Maung
 Dr Ba Maw
 U Ba Pe
 Dr Ma Saw Sa
 U Shwe Tha
 Mr S A S Tyabin

All the above were able to attend with the exception of Mr Kelkar who was prevented by illness from coming to England. We have learned with very great regret of the death of Mr Rangaswami Iyengar since his return to India.

The Delegates took part in more than seventy of our meetings some of which were devoted to discussion between the Delegates and ourselves and others to the hearing of evidence.

We desire to place on record our appreciation of the assistance which we have derived from our full and frank discussions with the Delegates for many of whom so long an absence from their own country must have caused great personal inconvenience and sacrifice. Their advice and co-operation have been of the greatest value to us. Many of them have also furnished us with separate memoranda on various points and we may mention in particular the Joint Memorandum signed by all the British Indian Delegates who were still in England, which has been of great service to us as focussing British Indian views and to which we shall have occasion often to refer in the course of our Report

We have held meetings in all and have examined over 120 witnesses, whose evidence has been printed in Volumes 2A, 2B and 2C of the Minutes of Evidence published in the autumn of 1933. We are much indebted to all the witnesses for the assistance which they gave us but our special gratitude is due to the Secretary of State for India, who, though a member of the Committee, took the perhaps unprecedented course of tendering himself as a witness, and who replied to nearly 6,000 questions during the nineteen days over which his evidence extended. In no other way could we have been so effectively enabled to distinguish, and to examine in all their bearings the intricate and difficult issues which we are charged to consider. We have also been fortunate in having at our disposal the practical knowledge of Indian affairs acquired by many of our own number from their personal experience in high office or in other work in India

PART I*

INTRODUCTION

1 The conditions of the problem with the examination of which we have been entrusted are brilliantly described in the comprehensive survey which forms Volume I of the Report of the Statutory Commission. We are not aware that the accuracy of this survey has been impeached, and we are content to take it both as the starting point and the textbook of our own investigation. Nor, indeed, could we do otherwise, for it would have been impossible for us in the time at our disposal to have accumulated and digested so vast a mass of fact and detail. We desire to place on record our deep obligation to the work of the Commission and our conviction that, if we had not had before us the fruits of their patient and exhaustive enquiries, we should scarcely have been able to enter upon, much less to complete within any measurable space of time, the task which Parliament has imposed upon us. Nevertheless if the labours of the Commission have happily relieved us of the task of restating by way of introduction the conditions of the Indian problem, there are certain elements in it which must so sensibly affect the judgment which we are invited to form and the recommendations which it will be our duty to make that we may be permitted briefly to refer to them.

2 The sub-continent of India, lying between the Himalayas and Cape Comorin, comprises an area of 1,570 000 square miles with a population now approaching 340,000 000. Of this area British India comprises about 820 000, and the Indian States 700 000 square miles with populations of about 260 000 000 and 80 000 000 respectively. It is inhabited by many races and tribes speaking over two hundred different languages or dialects and often as distinct from one another in origin tradition and manner of life as are the nations of Europe. Two-thirds of its inhabitants profess Hinduism in one form or another as their religion, over 77 000 000 are followers of Islam and the difference between the two is not only one of religion in the stricter sense but also of race, of law and of culture. They may be said indeed to represent two distinct and

*Note—For convenience it may be noted that this Part I was never considered as the Committee agreed to consider an alternative Part I laid before them by the Lord in the Chair on the 27th July, 1934. Vide infra, pp 470—491 separate civilisations. Hinduism is distinguished by the singular 33 phenomenon of caste which is the basis of its religious and social system and which, save in a very restricted field, remains impervious to the more liberal philosophies of the West. The religion of Islam on the other hand is based upon the conception of the equality of man. In addition to these two great communities there is also to be 40 found an infinite variety of other religions and sects ranging from

(i.e. excluding Burma see ibid., para. 45)

the simple beliefs of Animism to the mystical speculations of the Buddhist. The great majority of the people of India derive their living from the soil and practise for the most part a traditional and self-sufficing type of agriculture. The gross wealth of the country is 5 very considerable, but owing to the vast number of its inhabitants the average standard of living is low and can scarcely be compared even with that of the more backward countries of Europe. Literacy is rare outside urban areas, and even in these the number of literates bears but a small proportion to the total population.

3 In its political structure India is divided between British India 10 and the Indian States. The latter are nearly 600 in number.
They include 109 States among them great States like Hyderabad, Mysore, Baroda, Kashmir, Gwalior and Travancore, the Rulers of which are entitled to a seat in the Chamber of Princes. 128 which are represented in the Chamber by 12 of their own order elected by 15 themselves, and 397 Estates, Jagirs and others which are only States in the sense that their territory often consisting only of a few acres, does not form part of British India. The more important States within their own territories enjoy all the principal attributes of sovereignty but their external relations are in the hands of the 20 Paramount Power. The sovereignty of others is of a more restricted kind, and over others again the Paramount Power exercises in varying degrees an administrative control.

4. British India consists of nine Governors' Provinces (excluding Burma) together with certain other areas administered under the 25 Government of India itself. The Governors' Provinces possess a considerable measure of executive and legislative independence but over all of them the Government of India and the Central Legislature can exercise executive and legislative authority.
In respect of certain matters known as transferred subjects the 30 Provincial Executives are responsible to their Legislatures but the Governor-General in Council is independent of the Central Legislature and responsible only to the Secretary of State and through him to Parliament. An official bloc forms part of both the Central and Provincial Legislatures and in general acts in accordance with the 35 wishes of the Governor General and Provincial Governors respectively. British India is administered through a number of services, some of them all India services and some provincial. Of the former the most important is the Indian Civil Service recruited by the Secretary of State 40

5. Such in the barest outline is the present constitutional structure of British India into the details of which we shall have occasion to enter with more particularly when we deal with the specific proposals of the White Paper in their order. It will be seen that its main features are a Central Executive responsible only to the 45 Secretary of State and through him to Parliament. Provincial

Executives exercising powers over a wide field responsible in certain matters but not in others to the Provincial Legislatures, and Central and Provincial Legislatures exercising the law-making power, but with no control over the Executive in one case and 5 with only a limited control in the other. Yet notwithstanding the measure of devolution on the Provincial authorities which was the outcome of the Act of 1919, the Government of India is and remains in essence a unitary and centralised Government, with the Governor-General in Council as the keystone of the whole constitutional 10 edifice, and it is through the Governor-General in Council that the Secretary of State and ultimately Parliament discharge their responsibilities for the peace, order and good government of India.

6 We are not of opinion that the British rule in India stands in need of any apologist. We claim for it neither infallibility nor 15 perfection, but if, as with all governments it has at times fallen into error, its errors have been nobly and amply redeemed. Its first justification is that it has given to India that which throughout the centuries she has never possessed, a Government whose authority is unquestioned in any part of the sub-continent, next, that it has 20 barred the way against the foreign invader and has maintained tranquillity at home, and lastly, by the creation of a just administration and an incorruptible magistracy, that it has established the rule of law, and has secured to every subject of His Majesty in British India the right to go in peace about his daily work and to retain for 25 his own use the fruit of his labours. Nor ought we to omit to notice how small is the British element in the services by whose agency these results have been brought about. The total European population of British India today, including some 60,000 British troops, is only 135,000, the total British element in the superior services is 30 about 3,150, and of these there are approximately 800 in the Indian Civil Service and 500 in the Indian Police.

Results of British rule.

7 The magnitude of this achievement cannot be justly estimated without reference to the condition of things which preceded it. The arts of government and administration were not indeed 35 unknown to the Moguls, and the strong hand of the Emperors who reigned between 1525 and 1707 maintained a State which ultimately embraced the larger part of India and did not suffer by comparison with, if it did not even surpass in splendour, the contemporary monarchies of Europe. But the strength of the Mogul Empire 40 depended essentially upon the personal qualities of its ruling House, and when the succession of great Emperors failed its collapse inevitably followed, nor during its most magnificent period was its authority unchallenged either within or without its borders. Its system of government resembled that of other Asiatic despotisms 45 The interests of the subject races were made subservient to the ambitions, and often to the caprices, of the monarch, for the politic toleration of Akbar found no imitator among his successors.

The Mogul Empire.

The imperial splendour became the measure of the people's poverty, and their sufferings are said by a French observer, long resident at the Court of Aurungzeb, to have been beyond the power of words to describe.

15 8 There are pages in the history of India, between the collapse of the Mogul Empire and the final establishment of British supremacy, which even today cannot be read without horror. With 20

but brief intervals of relief vast tracts were given over to the internecine struggles of the princes the guerilla warfare of petty chiefs and the exactions of Indian and European adventurers and to townsmen and peasants alike the helpless victims of malice domestic, foreign lovy and the whole apparatus of anarchy it might have seemed that the sum of human misery was complete It is in the improvement which has taken place in Indian agriculture since the establishment of peace and security that the Royal Commission in 1928 found a measure of the extent to which husbandry had been injured and its progress delayed by the long period of disorder and unrest that preceded the British occupation.

Restoration of peace
and order

9 Such were the conditions out of which British rule created a new and stable polity not without the support and co-operation 20 of Indians themselves. Peace and order were re-established the Relations of the Indian States with one another and with the Crown were finally determined and the rule of law made effective through out the whole of British India. On this solid foundation the majestic structure of the Government of India rests and it can be claimed 23 with certainty that in the period which has elapsed since 1858 when the Crown assumed supremacy over all the territories of the East India Company the intellectual and material progress of India has been greater than it was ever within her power to achieve during any other period of her long and chequered history 30

Unity created by British rule.

10. The success of British rule has produced many and sometimes unforeseen, consequences. A strong central Government, without a rival to challenge its authority has transformed British India into a single unitary State. A sense of political unity has been thereby created and there have emerged the beginnings of a sense of nation 35 elity transcending as it would seem, the profound divisions of race language and religion and based upon the conception of India as the common heritage of all her peoples. India is far from being yet a homogeneous nation she is perhaps (and the future alone can tell) a nation in the making but we do not think it open to question that 40 the growth of any national spirit has only been rendered possible by the existence of a powerful and disinterested government willing to play the part of an impartial arbiter and able by the exercise of its authority to keep under control the centrifugal and disruptive forces produced by acute religious and racial conflict. It is a singular 45 reflection that in the English tongue Indian nationalists have found the most convenient vehicle for the public discussion and inter change of their political ideas but none can fail to appreciate its significance

national ideas.

11 It would be as unreasonable to feel surprise at the growth of this spirit as it would be idle to deny its existence. It was begotten 5 of the political union between the two countries and it has been sustained and nourished by an ardent study of British constitutional theory. Indian political thought postulating too hastily the universal validity of the latter a premise to which few Englishmen would give an unqualified assent, has not failed to point out a sup- 10 posed inconsistency between theory and practice in the case of British rule in India but the reality of the Indian argument rests in our opinion on other and broader grounds.

Basis of strength of Government
of India.

12. The strength of the Government of India for many generations may as it seems to us, be referred to two causes the first, its ac 15 countability to Parliament, which has given it a quality of stability and permanence impossible of attainment otherwise by a system of personal rule, the second its general acceptance by the mass of the Indian people. These were able indeed, and with good cause, to recognise the distinction between good governors and bad, but, so long as they were left alone, knew nothing of, or at least were indifferent to, any distinction between the forms of government itself. A people whose ambitions are wholly negative and do not extend beyond a desire for peace and tranquillity, will be content to accept any form of government which is strong and reasonably impartial, and that Government must be deemed the most successful which is able to satisfy the aspirations of those whom it governs at the particular stage of development which they have attained. It is perhaps the most signal tribute to British rule in India that the performance of all the fundamental purposes of government, that is to say, the maintenance of law and order and an upright administration, is now accepted as a matter of course, so that men are free to turn their thoughts to other things. Conditions have thus been created favourable in the case of an acute and ingenious race to speculation upon the forms of government, and, as a natural consequence, to the rise of that which is sometimes called a politically minded class. Men become no longer content to be well governed, but desire a voice in their own government. The Montagu Chelmsford Reforms and the Government of India Act, 1919, were designed to meet the demand then made. The claim is now to have a voice in the selection of those who govern.

13 The benevolent autocrat no less than the tyrant holds by a precarious tenure, if in the last analysis he has not the support of a body of public opinion whether tacit or expressed. Like Antaeus the ancient myth, he must draw strength from contact with the soil. The moralist may deplore, but the least cynical must admit, that the sentiment of gratitude plays but a small part in the formation of that opinion, and we should doubtless listen with incredulity to a historian who should ascribe it to the English people after the Conquest, yet the Normans made England a nation and laid the foundations of a system of law and administration which endures to this day. There is ample evidence that enlightened Indian opinion has a very just appreciation of the benefits derived from the British connection, but the attachment of a people to its government is not always determined by an objective calculation of material interests. The subtle ferment of education, the impact of the War, and the beginnings of that sense of nationality to which we have already alluded, go far to explain the want of harmony which exists between the present system of government and public opinion in India, so far as the latter is vocal. It may be justly observed that the qualification is a vital one and that there are no means of gauging the opinion of the vast and inarticulate mass of the cultivators who make up nine-tenths of the population and to whom an equitable land revenue settlement and the timely advent of the monsoon are likely for many years to be of greater importance than the most radical political changes. But though Parliament is a trustee for the masses of India and cannot disclaim the responsibilities which it has assumed on their behalf, it would in our opinion be unjust to judge the political consciousness of her people by the standard of the least instructed class.

14 No appreciation of the Indian problem would be complete if it affected to disregard the want of harmony of which we have spoken. Where, as in India, political education has not extended beyond a class small in comparison with the total population, it may be conceded that alleged manifestations of public opinion are often of doubtful value nor indeed are there wanting those who would refuse to attribute to them value of any kind. But we are not prepared to admit that over a period of four years the members of three Round Table Conferences and the members of this Committee have listened to the arguments and have shared the debates of men who represented in India no one but themselves. We are satisfied that a public opinion exists in India which it would be a profound error for Parliament to ignore that the estrangement between that opinion and the present system of government is prejudicial to the interests of both countries and that a readjustment of relations between the two partners is required.

The moment propitious for a readjustment of relations.

15 The moment is propitious for a readjustment of this kind. For the first time in the history of India representatives of her Princes and peoples have sat for many months in counsel with representatives of His Majesty's Government and of the great political parties of the United Kingdom and for the first time in the history of Parliament Indian delegates have taken part in the proceedings of a Joint Select Committee and have illuminated our discussions, even if circumstances forbid them to share our responsibilities. We do not suggest, nor would any Indian claim, that the conclusions which emerged from the minute and laborious diligence of the three Round Table Conferences are binding upon the United Kingdom or upon India but they are not on that account to be neglected or contemned. They are the fruits of an effort which will be deemed as laudable by a future as it might have seemed incredible to a past generation, to ascertain whether any substantial measure of agreement was possible upon the principles which should or might inform a new Constitution for India. It can scarcely have been supposed by the promoters of those Conferences that the free and unfettered discussion of questions so formidable and complex would succeed in producing a complete and harmonious reconciliation of contradictory or at least divergent opinions; but the common measure of agreement achieved must we apprehend, have exceeded their most hopeful expectations.

Emergence of body of central opinion.

16 We do not wish to imply that any scheme for the future government of India is at present in existence which can be said to have been agreed even unofficially between representatives of the two countries. We realize too that there is a party in India with whom the prospects of agreement of any kind may be remote but from the discussions and personal contacts of the last four years there has emerged a body of central opinion (for so we may describe it) in the creation of which a juster appreciation by each side of the difficulties and even more of the motives of the other has been perhaps not the least potent influence. This is a new and hopeful phenomenon. It is possible now to distinguish much common ground where previously the dividing gulf might have seemed unbridgeable and it will not be denied that, if the movement of British opinion has contributed to this result, so also has that of India. On the common ground thus marked out we believe that the foundations could be laid of a firm and enduring structure.

17 If then we are satisfied, for the reasons which we have given both that a readjustment is necessary and that the moment for effecting it is propitious it becomes our duty to consider the form which such a readjustment should take. For this purpose it is well

35 to recall that the ultimate aims of British rule in India have been often stated and are on record. They are set out with precision in the Preamble to the Government of India Act, 1919, which runs as follows—

40 "Whereas it is the declared policy of Parliament to provide for the increasing education of Indians in every branch of Indian administration, and for the gradual development of self-governing institutions, with a view to the progressive realization of responsible government in British India as an integral part of the Empire

45 And whereas progress in giving effect to this policy can only be achieved by successive stages and it is expedient that substantial steps in this direction should now be taken

And whereas the time and manner of each advance can be determined only by Parliament, upon whom responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian peoples

5 And whereas the action of Parliament in such matters must be guided by the co-operation received from those on whom new opportunities of service will be conferred, and by the extent to which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility

15 Subsequent declarations have not in our opinion added anything to the substance of this preamble, which is conceived in such wide and general terms that we should hesitate to put any limit upon its implications, save those which necessarily arise from the use of such words as "gradual" and "progressive." We are content, 20 therefore, to take the Preamble as a clear statement of the policy and aims of Parliament in relation to the government of India

18 The readjustment of the relations between the two partners ought, in the Indian view, to take the form of the grant forthwith, subject to certain conditions, of responsible government both in the 25 Provinces and at the Centre. There is no date or time-limit mentioned in the Preamble, and on this aspect of the matter, Parliament is bound by no pledges, and is free to make its own decision. It can grant the demand, or it can reject it as premature and unwise, and the grave and difficult task is laid upon us of recommending to 30 Parliament what its choice should be. After mature and anxious deliberation and with a full sense of our responsibilities, we have come without hesitation to the conclusion that it would be wrong and prejudicial to the interests of both countries to reject the Indian claim, and we shall endeavour in the paragraphs which follow to 35 explain and justify that conclusion. The quality of the problem as we shall indicate differs in the Provinces and in the Centre, but there are nevertheless certain general considerations which are applicable to both

19 The demand for responsible government in the Provinces was 40 admitted by the Statutory Commission and it might be sufficient for us to adopt the arguments which led them to that decision and from which we see no reason to dissent, but we think it right to add some observations of our own. We are content
20 therefore, to take the Preamble as a clear statement of the policy and aims of Parliament in relation to the government of India

responsible government we mean a form of government in which the executive is in some sense accountable to the Legislature, and not one 45 which implies no more than the substitution of Indian Ministers for official Councillors. It has seemed to us that this distinction was not always kept in mind by some of the Indian witnesses whom we heard 1 and, though we can understand prominence being given to the conception of government of Indians by Indians, it is necessary to emphasise that self-government and responsible government are by 5 no means the same thing. We use advisedly the expression 'in some sense accountable' lest we should be thought to advocate the adoption in India without qualification of the parliamentary system which obtains in the United Kingdom, a matter to which we propose to make reference subsequently in this Report.

Need for encouraging
responsibility

20 No Indian Federation is likely in our opinion to become a 10 successful and thriving State unless (so far as British India is concerned) it is based upon autonomous Provincial units with a vigorous and independent political life of their own. The present dyarchic system in the Provinces as the Statutory Commission pointed out, which was designed to develop a sense of responsibility has some- 15 times tended to encourage a wholly different attitude. A sense of responsibility is an attribute of character not a garment to be put on or discarded at will. It may be strengthened by inherited tradition but it must be acquired in the hard school of experience and the Statutory Commission rightly observe that it can only be taught 20 by making men responsible politically for the effects of their own actions. It is the misfortune of India that throughout all the centuries which preceded the establishment of the British Raj this doctrine has been unknown or obnoxious to her rulers. Of the mischiefs which have flowed and of the effect upon the 25 national character it is unnecessary to speak but it is not for us to complain if Indians now seek to apply a remedy which they have learned from an attentive study of our own history and which indeed we have held out to them as the ultimate view of our policy in India. We do not think that the opportunity ought any longer to 30 be denied them.

Responsible government and social reform

21 Secondly we are convinced that progress in one direction of 35 supreme importance to India can only be achieved under a system of responsible government. We may indeed legitimately claim that for the greater part of her material and intellectual progress she is 40 mainly indebted to British rule which has also ensured the order and tranquillity without which no progress of any kind is possible. But from one aspect of Indian life Government has deliberately stood aside it has followed a policy of neutrality and non-interference in all matters which touch the religions of India. It is not difficult 45 to justify that policy whether on grounds of expediency or on other grounds but so closely are the habits and customs of the people bound up with their religious beliefs that the effect has been to put grave obstacles in the way of social legislation by the Government of India in a sphere of immense and growing importance. In no 50 other sphere as all thoughtful Indians recognise is the need for social reform more urgent and vital yet Government is debarred by the considerations we have stated from effective interference in such matters as child marriage or the appalling problem of the untouchables. There are fetters which only Indian hands can strike off, and we can do no more than give Indian reformers the opportunity themselves of attempting the task. We are under no illusions as to the difficulties and obstacles which they are likely to encounter, but we are clear for the reasons which we have given that under responsible government alone can the attempt be made with any prospect of success

10 22 Lastly, we cannot ignore the swift march of events during the last few years. We have already spoken of the manner in which representatives of India have been willing to co-operate with men of this country for the purpose of reaching some common measure of agreement and of the success which, as it seems to us, has attended their efforts. It would be a matter of profound regret to us if the fruits of this co-operation were abandoned or at least treated as of little account. The singular change which has come over the Indian political scene is as encouraging as it is impressive, and the evidence satisfies us that it is due in large part to the belief of Indians that the joint labours of the last four years will not be thrown away. We cannot take the responsibility of recommending to Parliament a course of action which would not only disappoint a belief so strongly and universally held, but which we are convinced would also produce most unhappy consequences. It will be said that this is an argument of mere expediency, but we do not so regard it. We see the opportunity of terminating an estrangement between the two countries which, if it is allowed to continue, can bring nothing but harm to both of them. The material interests at stake are not inconsiderable, and Parliament will rightly desire to take them into account, but the other factors, to which we have drawn attention seem to us not less vital because imponderable and we believe that an even greater importance is to be attributed to them.

disappointing
expectations.

23 Much of what we have said applies equally to the Centre and to the Provinces, but the problem of responsibility at the Centre raises grave issues of its own. We do not forget that the Statutory Commission were unable to convince themselves that this further step was justified at the time when they made their Report, and we cannot lightly put aside the reasons which led them to that conclusion. It is admitted by responsible Indian leaders that whatever form the Central Government may take, the defence and external relations of India must for the time being remain the exclusive responsibility of the Governor-General. Hence any measure of responsible government at the Centre must involve a system of dyarchy but the Statutory Commission held strongly the view that a unitary government at the Centre was essential and should be preserved at all costs. "It must be a government", they wrote, "able to bear the vast responsibilities which are cast upon it as the Special problem of responsibility

central executive organ of a sub-continent presenting complicated and diverse features which it has been our business to describe", and they expressed the opinion that a plan based on dyarchy was unworkable and no real advance in the direction of developing central responsibility at all. To this we might add that what we have ourselves said above on the subject of dyarchy in the Provinces appears at first sight to be wholly inconsistent with any contrary view.

24 We recognise the force and weight of all these arguments but we have to deal with a state of things which did not, and indeed could not, enter into the consideration of the Statutory Commission when they reached their decision on this matter. Their examination of the problem was prosecuted at a time antecedent to the declaration

effected by the declaration of the Princes

by the Princes of their willingness to enter an All India Federation, and though they looked forward to such a Federation in the future, and indeed so framed their recommendations as to prepare the way 15 for it, they had no choice but to deal with things as they then were and not as they might afterwards become. We on the other hand, have to take into account as a new factor the declaration of the Princes that they are willing now to enter into an All India Federation, but subject always to this condition, that the Federal 20 Government is a responsible and not an irresponsible government. The importance of this declaration cannot be over-estimated, and if the choice is to be made between a responsible government at the Centre with the accession of the Princes and a continuance of the present system (even with some modification) without them 25 we cannot doubt what the choice would be. The Indian States, both geographically and economically are an integral part of India, and as the Statutory Commission observe there are few subjects which should form the field of activity of a central government in India which do not interest also the States. Their accession 30 to an All India Federation will in our opinion be found to be no less to their own advantage than it will undoubtedly be to the advantage of India as a whole but apart from this they have a special contribution of their own to make. They will strengthen the association between India and the Crown and we are also 35 persuaded that they will introduce into the new Constitution a cautious and conservative element, with a practical experience in the problems of government which will make for sobriety and stability in Indian politics of the future.

The arguments of the Statutory Commission.

23. Our recommendation then is conditional upon the accession 40 of the Princes and if we are asked what the position would be if the Princes should renege from their declaration, we can only reply that in that event, which happily there is no reason to contemplate, we are unaware of any pledges which bind either Parliament or His Majesty's Government, and that the matter will 45 be at large. But the problem of dyarchy at the Centre remains and the objections to it so strongly urged by the Statutory Commission have still to be considered. In our opinion a system of dyarchy at the Centre such as we propose is not open, at least in an equal degree to the criticisms levelled against it in the Provinces. There is only an imperfect analogy between the reservation of defence or external relations and that of the present reserved subjects in the Provincial sphere. In the Provinces the administration of the 5 reserved subjects touches so closely that of the subjects transferred to Ministers that an administrative decision in one field may profoundly affect decisions in another and a division of responsibility cannot fail to have perplexing consequences. Contact between the subjects of defence or external relations and the range of subjects 10 which, if our recommendations are accepted would fall within the sphere of Ministers at the Centre is, if not remote at least not a matter of daily occurrence. It is no doubt true that the Army at the Centre and police in the Provinces are both concerned with the preservation of order but their functions in this respect differ so 15 widely that administratively they present far more points of contrast than of likeness. We do not by any means overlook the question of finance or the reactions of the Army budget upon the finance of the central administration but here again no question arises of a constant impingement of one administrative sphere upon the other 20 Lastly it is reasonable to suppose that the interest of the Princes in all matters relating to the defence of India will make them unwilling to support any action tending to blur the responsibility of the Governor-General in this field or to become parties to ill-conceived criticism of his administration of the reserved departments. We are led to the conclusion, therefore, that the objections of the Statutory Commission are not in themselves an insuperable bar to the grant of responsible government even at the Centre, and we are not satisfied that the sacrifice of unity will render impossible the establishment of an efficient central executive.

26 As our enquiry has proceeded, we have been increasingly impressed not by the strength of the Central Government as at present constituted, but by its weakness. It is confronted by a Legislature whose members are unestrained by the knowledge that they themselves may be required to provide an alternative government, whose opinions are uninformed by the experience of power, and who are prone to regard support of government policy as a betrayal of the national cause. It is abundantly clear from the political history of the last twelve years that criticism by the Assembly has constantly influenced the policy of government, if the tendency of that criticism has been mainly destructive, this has been mainly due to the circumstances which we have just described. As a result, the prestige of the Government has been lowered, and disharmony between Government and Legislature has come to be regarded as an inevitable feature of their relationship. If this has been the case under existing conditions, we cannot doubt that the position would deteriorate still further if an irresponsible Centre were to be superimposed upon a number of autonomous Provinces.

Present relations between Government and Legislature.

27 It has been made clear to us that, with few exceptions, Indians of every shade of political opinion have come, rightly or wrongly, to regard a measure of responsible government at the Centre as the hallmark of nationhood, and as a thing vital to the status and self-respect of India. If these hopes and desires were now to be thwarted by the limitation to the provincial field of the principle of responsibility, we think the consequences would be disastrous alike in the Provinces and at the Centre. We apprehend that the centrifugal forces latent in all federal constitutions would be dangerously increased, and that if an irresponsible Centre were to come into conflict with autonomous Provinces upon an issue where the popular cause was championed by the Provinces, there might emerge a state of affairs which would threaten nothing less than the integrity of the Federation. Nor could we hold it reasonable to contemplate the successful coercion, by an irresponsible Central Executive, of autonomous Provinces whose governments enjoyed the full support of public opinion and of the Legislatures, both Central and Provincial.

28 Two qualities must attach to a successful Constitution: the first, that it should be workable, the second, that those to whom it is offered should be prepared to make it work. For the reasons we have given, we think that any Constitution will be found to be lacking in both these requirements which proposes, as a permanent arrangement, the co-existence of an irresponsible Central Executive with a number of autonomous Provinces in which responsible government has been established. In our view the grant of some measure of responsibility at the Centre is an act not of rashness but rather of wise and prudent statesmanship, and we are unable to resist the conclusion that those who have been moved to take a contrary view have failed in a just appreciation of the realities and values of the situation.

Requirements of a successful Constitution.

29 We have said above that by responsible government we mean 30 a form of government in which the executive is in some sense accountable to the Legislature and we are here faced by a grave and difficult problem. It is not unnatural that, in the words of the Statutory Commission, most of the constitutional schemes propounded by Indians should closely follow the British model nor can Parliament 35 be insensible to the compliment implied by such a preference at a time when the principles of parliamentary government have been successfully challenged in many parts of Europe and are regarded with suspicion or doubt in others. But the successful operation of parliamentary government postulates beyond question the existence 40 of certain essential conditions. It has been observed by a statesman of our own time whose liberal sympathies and whose knowledge of the working of democratic institutions will be questioned by none that the English constitution, which we admire as a masterpiece of delicate and complicated mechanism would anywhere but in 45 England be full of difficulties and dangers. It works by a body of understanding which no writer can formulate and of habits which centuries have been needed to instil. We think that

Lord Bryce would not have denied that the understanding and habits of which he speaks are in the main the creation of as they have in their turn helped to promote the growth of mutual confidence between the great parties in the State and of the fundamental belief, transcending the political differences of the hour which each 5 has come to repose in the good faith and motives of the other.
 Many causes have contributed to this result, which has not been achieved without stress and effort, and even civil conflict and we shall be chary of giving credit to race or temperament for national characteristics which perhaps with equal justice may be attributed 10 to the happy accident that we inhabit an island, and that for nearly a thousand years our political evolution has been undisturbed by the fact, and scarcely even by the menace of foreign invasion.

30 Parliamentary government, as it is understood in the United Kingdom, is based essentially on the principle of majority rule, and 15 majority rule is not a working principle of government, unless the minority for the time being are willing to accept, or at least to acquiesce in, the decisions of the majority. The existence of organized political parties, each able and willing to take over the responsibilities of government when the time arrives, is perhaps 20 necessary for the efficient working of the system that it may also be regarded as an essential element in it. It is nevertheless a singular paradox that in England the party system is a successful instrument of government mainly because there is always a large body of opinion which owes no permanent allegiance to either party but 25 gives its support in a greater or less degree to each party in turn and it is this body of opinion which, reacting instinctively against extravagant movements on one side or the other preserves an equipoise and tends always to bring the vessel back to an even keel.
 In the absence of a central balancing force of this kind, there must 30 always be the danger of a permanent majority and a permanent minority and since no room is then left for compromise or adjustment violent stresses are set up which, unless corrected or restrained are sufficient to disrupt and even to destroy the State.

31 There are in India no parties as we understand them, and no 35 mobile body of political opinion such as we have described. In their place we are confronted with the secular antagonism of Hindu and Muhammadan, representatives not only of two religions but of two civilisations: with numerous self-contained and exclusive 40 minorities, all a prey to anxiety for their future and profoundly suspicious of the majority and of one another, and with the rigid and immutable divisions of caste, itself a denial and repudiation of every democratic principle. The only forces making for homogeneity or solidarity which we are able to discern are the beginnings of the 45 idea of Indian nationality which we have already mentioned, and possibly also the sense of provincial citizenship, which in some Provinces, and perhaps in all is of real and growing significance

But none can predict whether either of those forces will in the end prove strong enough to absorb and obliterate the religious and racial cleavage, which indeed tends to become more and more acute with each successive transference of political power into 5 Indian hands. Communal representation must be accepted as inevitable at the present time, but it is a strange commentary on some of the democratic professions to which we have listened

32 We lay stress on these matters because in truth they are of the essence of the problem, and we should be doing no good service to 10 India by glossing them over or concealing them. It is wiser to face the facts. Things are what they are and not other things, and it cannot in the circumstances be a matter for surprise that many are to be found who, with every sympathy for Indian aspirations, declare that responsible government is on practical grounds an 15 impossibility in India. We have come nevertheless to a different conclusion. We recognise the difficulties and we desire that they should be recognised by Indians themselves. We recognise also that if free play were given to the powerful forces which would be set in motion by an unqualified system of parliamentary government, 20 the consequences might be disastrous to India and perhaps irreparable. But there is a middle course, and we are thus led to a consideration of what have come to be known as "safeguards"

A middle course possible.

33 We confess that we do not greatly care for the expression, since it has been constantly misinterpreted as implying an unreason-25 able insistence upon the need for protecting British, at the expense of Indian, interests, and upon a selfish reservation of powers wholly inconsistent with responsible government. Nothing could be further from the truth, not only are safeguards such as we contemplate not inconsistent with some form of responsible government, but in the 30 present circumstances of India it is no paradox to say that they are the necessary complement to any form of it, without which indeed it could have little or no hope of success. It will be found that the grant of responsible government to almost all British communities has been accompanied by safeguards of some kind, varying according 35 to the circumstances of the community, and it is in exact proportion as Indians show themselves to be not only capable of taking and exercising responsibility but able to resolve the difficulties of which we have spoken that both the need for safeguards and their use will disappear. Those difficulties have neither been created, nor can they 40 be resolved, by Parliament, they are inherent in the conditions of India, and if their existence necessarily qualifies the grant of responsible government, it is not on Parliament that criticism should fasten. We propose to examine later in this Report the nature of the safeguards suggested by His Majesty's Government, and it is sufficient 45 here to say that we could not recommend Parliament to approve an experiment, which we recognize to be not without risk and even danger, unless provision were made, so far as can reasonably be done for securing the conditions which in our opinion will alone make

Safeguards necessary in the interests of

it possible for the experiment to succeed at all. We therefore think it right to formulate what seem to us to be the essential elements in any new constitutional settlement.

34. One essential element is flexibility so that opportunity may be afforded for the natural processes of evolution with a minimum of 5 alteration in the constitutional framework itself. The deplorable and paralyzing effect of prescribing a fixed period for constitutional revision requires no comment in the light of events since 1919 but we are also impressed with the advantage of giving full scope for the development in India of that indefinable body of understanding of 10 political instinct and of tradition which Lord Bryce in the passage which we have quoted postulates as essential to the working of our own constitution. The success of a constitution depends indeed far more upon the manner and spirit in which it is worked than upon its formal provisions. It has been observed by an English judge that in 15 substance by everyone upon their strict legal rights would make the world an intolerable place, and the observation is peculiarly appropriate in the constitutional sphere where theory may prove sterile and even dangerous unless expanded or adapted by an accepted body of usage and practice. The new Indian Constitution 20 must contain in itself the seeds of growth. It is impossible to foresee, so strange and perplexing are the conditions of the problem, the lines which constitutional progress will eventually follow and it is, therefore, the more desirable that those upon whom responsibility will rest should have all reasonable scope for working out their own 25 salvation by the method of trial and error.

35. Next, we desire to emphasise the necessity for securing a strong Executive both in the Provinces and at the Centre. We have little to add to what the Statutory Commission have written on this point, and in our judgment they do not exaggerate when they say 30 that nowhere in the world is there such frequent need for courageous and prompt action as in India and that nowhere is the penalty for hesitation and weakness greater. We do not doubt that Indian Ministers, like others before them, will have ample opportunities for realising the truth of this and of learning the lesson which it teaches. 35 But, since we see no prospect for some time to come of Ministries united by a common political faith and supported by an organised and disciplined party we do not think that the risk of divided counsels and therefore of weakness in action is one which can be ignored. There must therefore, be (to quote again the Statutory 40 Commission) a power which can step in and save the situation before it is too late: there should be the fullest scope for self government but, if there is a breakdown then an alternative authority must operate unhindered. Such intervention ought nevertheless to take place only as a last resort, and must not be regarded as part of the 45 normal machinery of government: otherwise we see a risk that it may be invoked for the purpose of disclaiming responsibility in cases where it is above all things necessary that those on whom the primary responsibility is imposed should be ready and willing to bear it. Nor ought the Executive to be entirely at the mercy of the Legislature. We have no wish to under rate the legislative function but in India the executive function is in our judgment of over riding importance. In the absence of disciplined political parties the sense of respon 5 sibility may well be of slower growth in the Legislatures and the threat of a dissolution can scarcely be the same potent instrument in a country where, by the operation of a system of communal representation, a newly elected Legislature will often have the same complexity as the old. We touch here the core of the problem of responsible government in the new Indian Constitution, and we shall examine it in greater detail later in our Report.

36 No less important than a strong Executive is the maintenance of a pure and efficient administration, the backbone of all good government. The establishment of a public service, at once disinterested and incorruptible, is not the least of the benefits which British rule has given to India, and it is perhaps the most prized. We do not doubt that here and there in the lower official ranks the belief may still persist, an unhappy legacy of the misgovernment of the past, that office is a source of profit and corruption a venial thing, and it would be surprising if it were otherwise, for the habits of centuries are not so easily eradicated. We have ample proof, however, that Indian officials who occupy responsible positions hold as dear as any of their British colleagues the standards and traditions of the services to which they belong, and we see no reason why under a new order the standards should become lower, or the traditions lost. But the efficiency of a service is no less vital than its honesty. In no country perhaps does the whole fabric of government depend to a greater degree than in India upon its administration, and it is indeed literally true, as the Statutory Commission observe, that the life of millions of the population depends on the existence of a thoroughly efficient system. But no service can be efficient if it has cause for anxiety or discontent. It is essential therefore, in our judgment, that those whose duty it is to work this system should be freed from anxiety as to their status and prospects under the new Constitution, and that new entrants should not be discouraged by any apprehension of inequitable treatment. We have every hope that such anxieties or apprehensions will prove unfounded, but they may be none the less real on that account, and, so long as they exist, it is necessary that all reasonable measures should be taken to quiet them.

37 Lastly, we record our conviction that the existence of an authority in India, armed with adequate powers, able to hold the scales evenly between conflicting interests and to protect those who have neither the influence nor the ability to protect themselves, will be as necessary in the future as experience has proved it to be in the past. He would be a bold man who would prophesy the direction or effect of the new political forces in India, whether they will heal or accentuate existing divisions, whether they will promote toleration or encourage intolerance. Other, and perhaps most, peoples have achieved unity only after prolonged and often sanguinary internal conflict. We have rightly insisted in India upon a different solution, but if we have for that reason changed or deflected the natural processes of historical evolution we have also assumed the responsibility of ensuring that the experiment is conducted with justice towards all and with malice towards none.

38 Such in our opinion are the essential elements in a new Constitution for India, which any safeguards proposed, by whatever name they are called, should be designed to secure, and when we come to examine those which have been suggested by His Majesty's Government, their efficacy for this purpose will be the test by which we shall judge them. Seen in their proper perspective, they will promote and not hinder a normal constitutional development, but we are none the less persuaded that no constitutional development is possible without them. They are at once the background of the experiment and the condition of its initiation and the extent to which they are found unnecessary will be the true measure of its success.

39 We desire to touch upon one or two broader issues before concluding this part of our Report. We are not so vain as to suppose that our recommendations will secure unanimous approval but we would invite those who differ from us to consider very earnestly the possible alternatives. No one has suggested that any retrograde step should be taken, very few that the existing state of things should be maintained unaltered and the necessity for constitutional advance, at least within the limits of the Statutory Commission's report, may therefore be regarded as common ground. The question of responsibility at the Centre thus becomes the essence of the problem. But if that question should be determined in the negative, Parliament must be prepared to face the inevitable consequences, two of which in our opinion transcend all the others in importance: first, the Princes' declaration will no longer hold good and the prospect of an All India Federation disappears, perhaps for ever but certainly for many years to come and, secondly the co-operative efforts of the last few years and that body of central opinion which we have described and which has seemed to us so vital and hopeful an element in the future relations of the United Kingdom with India are irretrievably destroyed. These are grave issues. We should hesitate to forecast all the effects of the Princes' withdrawal or the dissipation of Indian confidence, but of this we are very certain that the difficulties of the Government of India would be increased almost to breaking point and that it would have to discharge its heavy responsibilities without the support of any section of Indian public opinion. We do not say that the task would be impossible, but we confess that we should shrink from the deliberate thrusting upon any government of so grievous a burden.

40. A policy with consequences such as these is one which we could never recommend to Parliament, nor can we believe that Parliament, weighing its own responsibilities to India, would willingly accept it. We cannot indeed complain if those whom we fail to convince lay stress upon the possible consequences of another policy. It has been and will be, urged that no Dominion has ever been faced within its border at one and the same time with all the problems with which India has to deal with the ever present risk of hostilities on her frontier with the cleavage between communal interests with innumerable differences of race and speech with a financial system largely dependent for its credit on centres outside India and with a vast population in every stage of civilisation. All these things are true and yet even the sum of them does not seem to us to conclude the argument. An answer has still to be found to the questions asked a century ago by a great servant of India, in a speech of which it was said that to have heard it might console the younger members of the House for never having heard Edmund Burke. Do we think that we can give the people of India knowledge without awakening ambition? Or do we mean to awaken ambition and provide it with no legitimate vent? The answer has now to be given and we hold strongly that it is more consonant

25 with the dignity of Parliament and with the traditions of the British people, if, when the time has come for Parliament to share its power with those whom it has sought to train in the arts of government, it should do so not ungraciously nor in any grudging spirit

41 There are moments in the affairs of nations when a way is 30 opened for the removal of long-standing differences and misunderstandings and for the establishment between people and people of new relations more in harmony with the circumstances of the time than those which they replace. Adjustments of this order, when they involve a transference of political power, must inevitably
 35 provide a sharp test of national character, and the instinct for the time and manner of the change is the sure mark of political sagacity and experience. If there are those to whom the majestic spectacle of an Indian Empire make so powerful an appeal that every concession appears almost as the betrayal of a trust, we would ask them 40 to look at the other side of the picture, different indeed in content, but not less charged with realities. India also has a right to be heard before judgment is pronounced, and her plea to be allowed the opportunity of applying principles and doctrines which we ourselves have taught cannot be met by a simple traverse or by a 45 denial of her interest in the cause

The United Kingdom and India

42 It has seemed to some that to permit India to control her own destiny is to sever the tie which unites her to the Crown and to the United Kingdom. Never could we contemplate the rupture of that beneficent and honourable association, but we believe that a union of partners may prove an even more enduring bond. We do not deny that the creation of an Indian Empire has profoundly affected the position of the United Kingdom and has magnified its 5 influence in the affairs of the world, but we do not think that the selfish or vainglorious element predominates in the pride which this country takes in the work accomplished. The best of those who were and are responsible for it have ever regarded themselves as the servants of India and not merely as the agents of a foreign power,

India and the Crown

 10 nor do we forget that it could not have been carried through without the co-operation of Indian hands. It has not needed our enquiry to remind us how great a place India fills in our own history. There is no part of His Majesty's dominions with the same power to recall memories or to stir emotions, and none with so great a succession of 15 warriors and administrators, by the story of whose achievements our hearts are still moved, as Sir Philip Sidney by the song of Percy and Douglas, more than with a trumpet. But the whole earth is the sepulchre of famous men, and those of whom we speak are now become a part no less of India than of English history. Their 20 arduous and patient labours founded a new and mighty State, and it is upon the foundations which they have laid that, as we hope, an Indian Federation will be built, in which under the Crown the people of India will find political contentment as well as scope for the free and orderly growth of national life

THE WHITE PAPER

43. Our terms of reference direct us to consider the future government of India and in particular to examine and report upon the proposals in Command Paper 4268 commonly known as the White Paper. The latter in fact embodies a complete scheme for Indian constitutional reform and we have found it convenient to make it the basis of our deliberations, though we have not in any way restricted them to the proposals which it contains. In these circumstances it has appeared to us equally convenient to take the 10 White Paper which in any case we have been directed to examine and report upon, as the general basis of this Report and to set out our recommendations as to the future government of India in the form of a commentary upon the White Paper scheme.

44. The proposals in the White Paper fall under three main heads, 15 which have been commonly referred to as Provincial Autonomy, Federation and Responsibility at the Centre. The terminology is not very happy but is well enough for the present purpose, and we shall not be misunderstood if we adopt it as a provisional description. It is our intention to examine the principles which underlie these 20 proposals and to state certain general conclusions at which we have arrived and thereafter to examine separately the proposals in relation to the following complementary or subsidiary matters—Distribution of Legislative Powers, Finance, the Services, the Judiciary, Commercial Discrimination, Constituent Powers, the Secretary of State 25 and the Council of India, the Reserve Bank, the Future Administration of Indian Railways, Audit and Auditor General, Advocates General and Transitory Provisions. This appears to us the more convenient course to adopt, in order that the essential elements of the scheme put forward by His Majesty's Government may be seen 30 in their proper perspective, unobscured by the mass of detail which the White Paper necessarily contains.

45. The proposals in the White Paper do not deal specifically with the question of Burma in relation to Indian constitutional problems, because opinion in Burma on the future of the country had not at 35 the date of the issue of the White Paper become crystallized. The Statutory Commission recommended that Burma should cease to be a part of British India, and we have arrived at the same conclusion. In these circumstances it is our intention to deal fully with the future constitution of Burma in Part III of our Report where we 40 shall set out and discuss the reasons which have appeared to us to justify our recommendation.

I—PROVINCIAL AUTONOMY

(1) THE AUTONOMOUS PROVINCES

46. The scheme of Provincial Autonomy as we understand it is one whereby each of the Governors' Provinces will possess a Governor and Legislature having exclusive authority within the province in a 5 precisely defined sphere and in that sphere free from all control (or practically all control) by the Central Government. This we conceive to be the essence of Provincial Autonomy though no doubt there is room for wide differences of opinion with regard to the manner in 10 which that exclusive authority is to be exercised. It represents a fundamental departure from the present system, under which the Provincial Governments exercise a devolved and not an original authority. The Act of 1919 and the Devolution Rules made under it, by earmarking certain subjects as "provincial subjects," created 15 indeed a sphere within which responsibility for the functions of government rests primarily upon the provincial authorities, but that responsibility is not an exclusive one, since the Governor-General in Council and the Central Legislature still exercise an extensive authority throughout the whole of the Provinces. Under 20 the proposals in the White Paper, the Central Government and Legislature would, generally speaking, cease to possess in the Governors' Provinces any legal power or authority with respect to any matter falling within the exclusive Provincial sphere.

47 "The Provinces are the domain," wrote the authors of the 25 Montagu-Chelmsford Report, "in which the earlier steps towards the progressive realisation of responsible government should be taken.
 Some measure of responsibility should be given at once, and our aim is to give complete responsibility as soon as conditions permit."
 Their intention was to give an independent life to the organisms 30 which would in future form the members of a British India Federation, an ideal at that time not within measurable distance. To-day, so rapid has been the march of events since 1919, we are discussing not only a Federation of British India, but an all-India Federation, and we could not ourselves contemplate such a Federation, whether 35 it comes about in the immediate or more distant future, which in its British India aspect is composed of other than autonomous units, independent within their own sphere of any central control.
 We have arrived, therefore, at the same conclusion on this subject as the Statutory Commission, and substantially on the same grounds.¹ 40 Of all the proposals in the White Paper, Provincial Autonomy has received the greatest measure of support on every side. The economic, geographical, and racial differences between the Provinces on the one hand and the sense of provincial individuality on the

The principle accepted

other, have greatly impressed us. The vast distances of India and the increasing complexity of modern government are strong additional arguments in favour of the completion of the process begun in 1919, and of a development in which the life of each Province 5 can find vigorous and adequate expression, free from interference by a remote central government. We proceed, therefore, to consider the manner in which the proposals of His Majesty's Government give practical effect to the autonomy principle.

The Ambit of Provincial Autonomy

10 48 The first problem is to define the sphere within which Provincial Autonomy is to be operative. The method adopted by the White Paper (following in this respect the broad lines of Dominion Federal Constitutions) is to distribute legislative power between the Central and Provincial Legislatures respectively, and to define the Central and 15 Provincial spheres of government by reference to this distribution.²
 In Appendix VI, List II, of the White Paper are set out the matters with respect to which the Provincial Legislatures are to have exclusive legislative powers, and the sphere of Provincial Autonomy in effect comprises all the subjects in this list. The subjects in List II (the 20 exclusively Provincial List) represent generally with certain additions

Distribution of legislative powers between Centre and

those which the Devolution Rules under the Act of 1919 earmarked as 'provincial subjects' and we are of opinion that in its broad outline the List provides a satisfactory definition of the provincial sphere. We shall have certain suggestions and recommendations to make later when we come to consider the List in detail, and there are a few subjects included in it with regard to which a complete provincialization might, as it seems to us be prejudicial to the interests of India as a whole. It will however be convenient to leave this aspect of the matter for subsequent examination.

49 There is, however another List (Appendix VI List III), in which are set out a number of subjects with respect to which it is proposed that the Central Legislature shall have a power of legislating concurrently with the Provincial Legislatures, with appropriate provision for resolving a possible conflict of laws.¹ Experience has shown both in India and elsewhere that there are certain matters which cannot be allocated exclusively either to a Central or to a Provincial Legislature and for which, though it is often desirable that provincial legislation should make provision, it is equally necessary that the Central Legislature should also have a legislative jurisdiction, to enable it in some cases to secure uniformity in the main principles of law throughout the country in others to guide and encourage provincial effort, and in others again to provide remedies for mischiefs arising in the provincial sphere but extending or liable to extend beyond the boundaries of a single Province. Instances of the first are provided by the subject matter of the great Indian Codes of the second by such matters as labour legislation, and of the third by legislation for the prevention and control of epidemic disease. It would in our view be disastrous if the uniformity of law which the Indian Codes provide were destroyed or whittled away by the uncoordinated action of Provincial Legislatures. On the other hand local conditions necessarily vary from Province to Province, and Provincial Legislatures ought to have the power of adapting general legislation of this kind to meet the particular circumstances of a Province.

50. We had at first thought that the case could be met by so defining the powers of the Central Legislature as to restrict its competence in this sphere to the enacting of broad principles of law the Provincial Legislatures being left to legislate for the Provinces within the general framework thus laid down. We are however satisfied that, with regard at any rate to some of the subjects in List III, the local conditions in a Province may require the enactment of legislation modifying a general law applicable to the Province and that the power of enacting complementary legislation alone would not suffice. If it be said that this difficulty could be met by entrusting the Central Legislature with the power themselves to legislate for the purposes of meeting the particular needs of a single Province our answer would be that it is wrong in principle to give the Central Legislature power to enact legislation for one Province only on a matter which ex hypothesi must necessarily be one of exclusively local concern. There is no analogy between local legislation enacted by the Parliament at Westminster and the instance of a single local authority and a power to legislate for an autonomous British India Province. Nor can we disregard the obvious fact that the necessity for obtaining Central legislation might in practice cause grave difficulties to a Province, especially in cases where the demand for an amendment of the law is immediate and urgent

51 The White Paper proposes that where there is conflict between 35 the Central and Provincial legislation with respect to a subject comprised in List III the Central Legislation shall prevail, unless the Provincial legislation is reserved for and receives the assent of the Governor-General¹ This appears to us an appropriate device for effecting a reconciliation between the two points of view, and it has 40 the further merit of avoiding the legal difficulties to which any attempt further to refine the definitions in Part III for the purposes of distributing the legislative power between the Central and Provincial Legislatures would of necessity create We, therefore, approve the principle of the Concurrent List, though we reserve for subsequent 45 consideration the question of the particular subjects which in our opinion ought to be included in it

Conflicts of law in concurrent

52 We have pointed out above that in List II are set out the matters with respect to which the Provincial Legislatures are to have exclusive legislative powers and that, generally speaking, this List provides a satisfactory definition of the provincial sphere List I in 5 Appendix VI similarly sets out the matters with respect to which the Central Legislature is to have exclusive legislative powers, and these two Lists (together with the Concurrent List) are so widely drawn that they might seem at first sight to cover the whole field of possible legislative activity, and to leave no residue of 10 legislative power unallocated It would, however, be beyond the skill of any draftsman to guarantee that no potential subject of legislation has been overlooked, nor can it be assumed that new subjects of legislation, unknown and unsuspected at the present time, may not hereafter arise, and therefore, however carefully the 15 Lists are drawn, a residue of subjects must remain, however small it may be, which it is necessary to allocate either to the Central Legislature or to the Provincial Legislatures The plan adopted in the White Paper is that the allocation of this residue should be left to the discretion of the Governor-General, and settled by him ad hoc 20 on each occasion when the need for legislation arises

The residuary legislative power

53 We cannot regard this plan as a satisfactory one, though it may be inevitable We gathered from our discussions with the Indian delegates that a profound cleavage of opinion exists in India with regard to the allocation of residuary legislative powers, one 25 school of thought, mainly Hindu, holding as a matter of principle that these powers should be allocated to the Centre, and the other, mainly Muhammadan, holding not less strongly that they should be allocated to the Provinces In these circumstances the proposals of His Majesty's Government are obviously in the nature of a compromise 30 It will be observed that, for the purpose of reducing the residuary powers to the smallest possible compass, the lists of subjects dealt with in List I and List II respectively are necessarily of great length and complexity, but that if it had been possible to allocate residuary legislative powers to e.g. the Provinces, only a list of Central powers 35 would have been required, with a provision to the effect that the legislative powers of the Provinces extended to all powers not expressly allocated to the Centre, and conversely, if the residue had been allocated to the Centre This broadly is the plan which has been adopted in Canada and Australia, the residuary powers being vested, Cleavage of opinion in India

in the case of Canada in the Dominion Legislature, and, in the case 40 of Australia, in the Legislatures of the States. Experience has unhappily shown that even so it has been impossible to avoid much litigation on the question whether legislation on a particular subject falls within the competence of one Legislature or the other and it is only too clear that the possibility of litigation is immensely increased 45 by the plan adopted in the White Paper. The more the two Lists enter into detail, the greater that possibility must be and yet, if the principle of two Lists is accepted, we do not see how this detailed statement of legislative powers can well be avoided.

54. We do not doubt that these difficulties were as present to the minds of His Majesty's Government as they are to our own and we fully appreciate the reasons which have led them to adopt a plan on which criticism can so readily fasten. We are unwilling therefore, to recommend an alteration in the White Paper proposal though we 5 have not overlooked the scope for litigation which two long and detailed lists, each defining an exclusive legislative jurisdiction, must afford. It seems to us that the logical conclusion of the proposals in the White Paper would be the allocation to the Provincial Legislatures of all legislative powers (apart from those included in 10 the Concurrent List) which are not expressly assigned to the Central Legislature but we recognise that logic is not always a safe guide where an apparently irreconcilable difference of opinion exists between the great Indian communities on a matter which both of 15 them appear to regard as one of principle.

Existing and Future Governors Provinces

55. The existing Governors Provinces are the Presidencies of Bengal, Madras and Bombay and the Provinces known as the United Provinces, the Punjab, Bihar and Orissa, the Central Provinces Assam, the North West Frontier Province and Burma. We have 20 considered the problem of Burma in a separate part of our Report, and it is unnecessary to say more in this place than that we have come to the conclusion that Burma should cease to be a part of British India. The White Paper proposes that there shall in future be a new Province of Sind and a new Province of Orissa, the former 25 being carved out of the Presidency of Bombay and the latter mainly out of the Province now known as Bihar and Orissa, but also including a portion of what is now Madras territory and a very small area from the Central Provinces.

56. On the constitution of Sind as a separate Governor's Province 30 we quote the following passage from the Statutory Commission's Report: 'We have great sympathy with the claim but there are grave administration objections to isolating Sind and depriving it of the powerful backing of Bombay before the future of the Sukkur Barrage is assured and the major readjustments which 35 it will entail have been effected. Even if it were held that the time is ripe for the separation of Sind to be seriously considered there would have to be a close and detailed enquiry into the financial consequences which would follow from such a step before a decision could be taken. When this opinion was recorded the Barrage 40 was still under construction but it is now completed and successfully in operation, though the general fall in agricultural prices has necessarily affected the financial position. The financial difficulties involved in the creation of an autonomous Sind have been examined first by an expert committee and later by a conference 45

of representatives of Sind presided over by an official, and the findings of both Committees have been reviewed by the Government of India and by His Majesty's Government. We are informed that it is now anticipated that the new Province would start with an initial yearly deficit of about $\frac{3}{4}$ crore, which would be gradually extinguished in about 15 years, and that after that period the Province should be able to dispense with assistance. We discuss elsewhere the effect of the separation of Sind from Bombay upon both Central and Bombay finances, and it is sufficient to say here that the difficulties do not appear to be of such magnitude as to form any insuperable bar to the establishment of a separate Province.

57 The difficulty of administering from Bombay a territory racially and geographically separated from the rest of the Presidency has proved capable of being overcome under present arrangements, but the case for separation, which is strong under any form of administration, is greatly strengthened if the administration of Bombay is transferred over to an Executive responsible to the Legislature. The question is, however, one which has aroused acute communal controversy. The case for separation has been pressed not merely by the Sind Muhammadans but also by Muhammadan leaders elsewhere in India. Separation has been as strongly opposed by the Hindu minority in Sind who, though they only form about 27 per cent of the population, are economically powerful and under the present provincial franchise actually form a majority of the voters. It is impossible not to sympathise with the desire of the Hindu community in Sind to remain under the rule of the richer Bombay Government, which is also likely to share their communal sympathies. Nevertheless, it seems to us that, apart from other considerations, the communal difficulties that would arise from attempting to administer Sind from Bombay would be no less great than those which may face a separate Sind administration. It is proposed that the Hindus shall be allotted a considerable proportion of the seats in the Legislature, and they will of course enjoy the protection of the special safeguards for minorities which will apply to the minorities in other Provinces, and it may be noted that a Sind Muhammadan witness who appeared before us recognized that the Hindus must play an important part in the government of the Province.¹ We have reached the conclusion that Sind ought to become a separate Governor's Province. In view of the very special importance to the Province of the continued success of the Baira project and of the very large financial issues involved, which will concern the Federal Government as well as the Province of Sind, it is proposed that the Governor of Sind should have a special responsibility for the administration of the Baira.² This seems to us an essential provision and is one to which we understand that little or no objection has been taken.

² White Paper, Proposal 70.

58 The Statutory Commission describe the union which now exists between Orissa and Bihar as "a glaring example of the artificial connection of areas which are not naturally related",¹ and the demand of the Orissas for separation has been long and insistent. The main difficulty here is a financial one, since Orissa is now and may well remain in deficit area. A separate Province of Orissa would however be perhaps the most homogeneous province in the whole of British India, both racially and linguistically the communal difficulty is practically non-existent and its claim appears to have the sympathy and support of all parties in India. The financial effect of the creation of the proposed new Province upon the finances of the Federation is discussed elsewhere, and we are satisfied that no difficulties of a financial kind beyond those which already exist are likely to be caused thereby. In these circumstances we recommend that a new Province of Orissa be constituted.

59 We may here mention the situation which exists in the Central Provinces in connection with the territory known as the Berars. This territory forms part of the dominions of His Exalted Highness the Nizam of Hyderabad, but has since 1863 been under British administration and in 1902 was made the subject of a perpetual lease granted by His Exalted Highness. It is administered with, but not as part of, the Central Provinces. The inhabitants elect a certain number of representatives who are then formally nominated as members of the Central Provinces Legislature and legislation both of that Legislature and of the Central Legislature is applied to the Berars through the machinery of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act. It has been announced that an arrangement has now been made between the Government of India and His Exalted Highness, whereby without derogation from His Exalted Highness's sovereignty the Berars shall be administered as part of a new Province to be known as the Central Provinces and the Berars, that is to say if and when Provincial Autonomy is established under the new Constitution. We have learned with great satisfaction of this arrangement, which will obviate the difficulties which might otherwise have arisen if the setting up of responsible government in the Central Provinces had necessitated a severance between two areas which have so long been in substance, if not in form, under a single administration and we think that the successful working of Provincial Autonomy in the Central Provinces will owe much to His Exalted Highness's wise and far-seeing action.

60. The White Paper proposes that the present Governors' Provinces shall retain the boundaries which exist at the present time with such alterations as the establishment of Sind and Orissa may involve.² In the case of Sind, the new Province is to comprise the whole area at present under the jurisdiction of the Commissioner-in

Sind, and it is suggested that the boundaries of Orissa shall be those recommended by a Committee which inquired into the subject in 1932, with certain modifications considered desirable by the Government of India. We understand that in the case of Orissa the boundaries proposed have given rise to local controversy but the question involves administrative considerations on which we are not competent to express an opinion, and in our judgment it must be left to the Government of India and His Majesty's Government to determine. The White Paper does not refer to the possibility of a future revision or adjustment of provincial boundaries but provision will have to be made in the Constitution Act for this purpose and we are clear that it should be a function of the Central Legislature and Government, though the initiative must come from the Provinces concerned.

15 61 It is possible that in the future it may be found desirable to constitute new Governors' Provinces, either by a sub-division or an amalgamation of existing areas. We think that the power to create a new Governor's Province should be reserved to the Crown and to Parliament, but that it should only be exercised on an address from 20 the Central Legislature, and, where an existing Governor's Province is affected, at the request of that Province

(2) THE PROVINCIAL EXECUTIVE

62 We come now to the proposals of the White Paper on the subject of the Provincial Executive, and it will be convenient in 25 this part of our Report to consider two general questions, first, the Provincial Executive as such, and second, its relation to the Provincial Legislature

The Provincial
Executive

63 The Statutory Commission in the first part of their Report describe the Provincial Executive as it at present exists, and it is 30 unnecessary for us to repeat in detail what they have already said¹. In brief, the "provincial subjects" with which the Provincial Executive is now concerned are sub-divided into "transferred subjects" and "reserved subjects". The first group are administered by the Governor acting with Ministers, the second by the Governor
 35 in Council. The Members of the Governor's Council, who may not exceed four and of whom by an invariable rule at least half are Indians, are appointed by His Majesty and one at least must have been for not less than twelve years in the service of the Crown in India, the Ministers are appointed by the Governor
 40 The Governor presides at meetings of his Executive Council, where ordinarily the decision of the majority prevails, though the Governor has in case of equality of votes a casting vote and in certain circumstances a right to over-rule his Councillors. The Ministers are chosen by the Governor from the elected 45 members of the Provincial Legislative Council and are not

members of the Executive Council, though in many Provinces both Executive Councillors and Ministers meet regularly under the presidency of the Governor for the purpose of discussing matters of common interest, in Madras, for example, we understand that it
 5 has been always the practice to regard Councillors and Ministers as forming as it were a single body, by which all questions of policy are discussed, though the responsibility for actual decisions upon them rests upon the Governor in Council or on the Governor advised by his Ministers, as the case may be, according to the nature
 10 of the subject. The Governor is required to be "guided by" the advice of his Ministers in relation to transferred subjects, unless he sees sufficient cause to dissent, in which case he may require action to be taken otherwise than in accordance with that advice. Ministers hold office at the Governor's pleasure, but the financial powers of 15 the Legislature give the latter the means of influencing ministerial policy. The members of Council, though ex-officio members of the Legislature, are independent of it and in practice are appointed for a fixed term of five years.

64 The White Paper proposes to do away with this dyarchical 20 system. It vests the whole executive power and authority of the Province in the Governor himself, as the representative of the King, and it provides the Governor with a Council of Ministers to "aid and advise" him in all matters, except such matters as will be left by the Constitution to the Governor's discretion¹. The proposal therefore is to give Ministers who (according to the White Paper) may not be officials and will be members of a Legislature to which they will look for support the constitutional right to advise the Governor over practically the whole of the provincial sphere. It will be observed that Provincial Autonomy does not necessarily imply a system of government of this kind, and the two should not be confused but for the reasons which we have given earlier in this Report we think that the time has now come for enabling Indians to assume a greater measure of responsibility for the government of the Provinces, and in our opinion (though we reserve for subsequent consideration the details of the scheme) the proposal in the White Paper which we have described above is the correct constitutional method of bringing about that result. It is according to precedent, and it is based upon English constitutional theory and practice.

The adoption of English constitutional forms need not, however imply and the White Paper does not contemplate the establishment in each Province of a system analogous in all respects to that which prevails in the United Kingdom at the present day nor White Paper Proposal 6 There will be a few Provinces certain Excluded Areas (i.e. those where any advanced form of political organization is unsuited to the primitive character of the inhabitants). These will be directly ruled by the Governor himself and Ministers will have no constitutional right to advise him in connection with them.

is there any inconsistency in this as some have supposed. A brief examination of the manner in which from time to time those forms have been adapted in practice to the needs of other communities in allegiance to the Crown will sufficiently make this clear.

In English theory all executive power (with certain exceptions not here relevant) is to-day as it has been from the earliest times, vested in the Monarch. The limits of this power are determined in part by common law and in part by statute but within those limits the manner of its exercise is not subject to any legal fetter save in so far as a statute may specify formalities for the doing of a particular executive act. But at all times in English history the Monarch has had counsellors to aid and advise him in the exercise of his power and their status and functions at different periods mark the successive stages of constitutional development. The great nobles who had claimed a prescriptive right to be consulted and who were often powerful enough to subject to their will a weak or reluctant King gave place, as the complexity of government increased to a more permanent Council whose members were the King's servants selected by him from nobles and commoners alike whom he consulted or not as he pleased, and who became the instruments of his own policy. The growing influence of the House of Commons at a later date made it necessary for the King always to number among his advisors persons who were members of that body and the last stage was reached when he sought the advice not of the Council as a whole but only of those members of it who represented the predominant political party of the day. By the middle of the 19th century constitutional usage and practice had so far supplemented constitutional law that the powers possessed in legal theory by the Sovereign were almost entirely exercised on the advice of Ministers possessing for the time being the confidence of Parliament.

67 This ingenious and convenient adjustment of a legal frame- Its flexibility.
 work to the successive stages of political evolution has given a flexibility to the English Constitution which it would have been 35 impossible to secure by any Act of Parliament or written Declaration of Rights. To imprison constitutional practice and usage within the four corners of a written document is to run the risk of making it barren for the future. This was foreseen by the framers of those Dominion and Colonial Constitutions which have followed the 10 British model and, once it by no means followed that the circumstances of a new State were appropriate for the application of the whole body of English doctrine in its most highly developed form, recourse was had to another device, no less flexible, for the purpose of indicating to the Governor-General or Governor how far in the 45 exercise of the executive power he was to regard himself as bound by English precedent and analogy. This is the Instrument of Instructions and though Dominion and Colonial Constitutions, and especially the former, necessarily embody much that is still regulated by usage and custom in the United Kingdom, the Instrument of Instructions long preserved (and in many cases still preserves) a sphere in which constitutional evolution might continue without involving any change in the legal framework of the Constitution

 5 itself

68 It has thus been found possible in communities in every state of development which possess constitutions based upon the English model, without doing violence to existing forms of government, to bring them into harmony with the political circumstances of the 10 time. Constitutional usage and practice is an ever changing body of doctrine and not an immutable body of dogma, nor can it be assumed a priori that usage and practice which may be eminently adapted to the circumstances of the United Kingdom can be applied without any qualification to the circumstances of India. This 15 would be to assume that the political development in India has reached the same stage as in this country, and we shall not be taken as implying either censure or criticism, if we say that the facts are notoriously otherwise. The picture presented by India is that of a country with a population so far from homogeneous and so divided 20 by racial and religious antagonisms that government by unqualified majority rule is admittedly impossible at the present time, and the proposal of the White Paper that even the Governor's Council of Ministers should be so constituted as to include as far as possible members of important minority communities appears to be firmly 25 supported by the great mass of Indian political opinion

69 The White Paper recognises, rightly as it seems to us, that in these circumstances the Governor, in whom the executive power of the Province is legally vested, may from time to time have to exercise on his own responsibility powers which elsewhere and under other 30 conditions might be exercised on the advice of Ministers¹. It is permissible to recall the religious and political conflicts which distracted our own country for so many generations before the settlement which followed the events of 1688. It is not until after that date that the beginnings of responsible government, as we now know 35 it, are to be found, and for many years the Monarch, even if he sought the advice of Ministers continued to act on his own judgment in every branch of the administration. Not until the two great parties in the State could trust each other not to abuse the political power which the hazard of the polls might place in the hands of one of them would it have been possible effectively to secure peace and 40 good government without the presence of some authority able and willing to exercise that power independently of both.

est
ma. 70. It would be possible to rely entirely upon prerogative instruments for the purpose of adapting English constitutional practice to the conditions which obtain to-day in India. Thus the Instrument 45 of Instructions might direct the Governor to be guided generally

by the advice which he receives from his Ministers, but reserve to him a very wide discretion to act upon his own responsibility when the circumstances seemed so to require and for this plan many precedents are to be found in the history of Colonial Constitutions.
Or the Instrument might specify certain particular matters with 5 regard to which the Governor is to exercise his own discretion whatever the advice of his Ministers might be and precedents for this are also to be found. The White Paper however introduces a new method for which, so far as we are aware, no exact precedent is to be found but which is not hastily to be rejected on that account. 10
It proposes that the Constitution Act shall declare that for certain specified purposes the Governor is to have a special responsibility ⁷¹ and we understand the intention to be that the Instrument of Instructions shall refer in terms to these special responsibilities and direct the Governor where in his opinion one 15 of them is involved, to take such action as he thinks that the circumstances may require even if this means dissenting from the advice tendered to him by his Ministers while in other matters he will be guided by that advice

71 We have already pointed out that in the present Government 20 of India Act there is a provision which requires the Governor to be guided by the advice of his Ministers in all matters relating to transferred subjects, unless he sees sufficient cause to dissent from their opinion. The White Paper, as we read it does not propose that the Constitution Act itself shall contain any provisions on this 25 subject it provides that the Governor shall have a Council of Ministers to aid and advise him but leaves his relations with his Ministers to be determined wholly by the Instrument of Instructions.
We approve this departure from the provisions of the existing Act, for to impose a statutory obligation on the Governor to be guided 30 by ministerial advice is to convert a constitutional convention into a rule of law and thus perhaps to bring it, most undesirably within the cognizance of the Courts. We are also of opinion that to declare in the Act itself that certain special responsibilities are to rest upon the Governor instead of leaving them to be enumerated hereafter in 35 the Instrument of Instructions is a plan which has much to commend it. In the first place it will be an assurance to Indian public opinion that the discretionary power of the Governor to dissent from his Ministers' advice is not intended to be unlimited and secondly it will secure to Parliament the right to consider and debate the scope 40 of the Governor's powers, before the Constitution Bill passes finally from their control.

⁷² We do not understand the declaration of a special responsibility with respect to a particular matter to mean or even to suggest that on every occasion when a question relating to that matter comes up 45 for decision the decision is to be that of the Governor to the exclusion of his Ministers. In no sense does it define a sphere from which the action of Ministers is excluded. In our view, it does no more than indicate a sphere of action in which it will be constitutionally proper for the Governor, after receiving ministerial advice, to signify his dissent from it and even to act in opposition to it, if in his own unfettered judgment he is of opinion that the circumstances of the case so require. Nor do we anticipate that the occasions on which a Governor will find it necessary so to dissent or to act in opposition to the advice given to him are in normal circumstances likely to be numerous, and certainly they will not be, as some appear to think, of daily occurrence. We leave for later consideration the list of the special responsibilities themselves and the manner in which they are defined, but, if we have rightly appreciated their place in the Constitution, it appears to us unnecessary to seek to define them with meticulous accuracy, though we readily admit that their general scope and purpose should be set out with sufficient precision.

73 The White Paper proposes a novel procedure in connexion with the Instrument of Instructions, viz., that an opportunity shall be given to Parliament of expressing an opinion upon it before it is finally issued by the Crown¹. There is, we think, ample justification for this proposal, which has been rightly extended not only to the original Instrument but also to any subsequent amendments of it, and we are satisfied that in no other way can Parliament so effectively exercise an influence upon Indian constitutional development. It is essential that the vital importance of the Instrument of Instructions in the evolution of the new Indian Constitution should be fully appreciated. Thus, Ministers would have no constitutional right under the Act to tender advice upon a matter declared by the Act to be within the Governor's own discretion, but the Governor could in any event, and doubtless often would, consult them before his own decision was made, and if at some future time it seemed that this power of consultation might with safety be made mandatory and not permissive, we can see nothing inconsistent with the Act in an amendment of the Instrument of Instructions for such a purpose. But so grave are the issues involved in the Indian constitutional problem that it would be neither wise nor safe in the case of India to deny Parliament a voice in the determination of the progressive stages of that evolution. The initiative in proposing any change in the Instrument must necessarily rest with the Crown's advisers, that is to say, with the government of the day, but the consequences of any action taken may be so far reaching and so difficult to foresee that Parliament, if denied a prior right of intervention, may find itself compromised in the discharge of the responsibilities which it has assumed towards India, and yet powerless to do anything save to protect. For this reason we are clearly of opinion that, as the White Paper proposes, it is with Parliament that the final word should rest.

74 We have now considered the nature of the Provincial Executive in broad outline, but five questions of capital importance which arise in connexion with the subject remain to be examined. These are (i) The nature of the Governor's special responsibilities, (ii) the Governor's selection of Ministers, (iii) the field in which Ministers are to be entitled to advise the Governor, (iv) the arrangements whereby the Governor will secure that his information with regard to the current affairs of the Province is adequate to enable him to discharge his special responsibilities (v) the special and additional powers, if any which the Governor ought to possess

Special Questions connected with the Executive

(i) Nature of the Governor's Special Responsibilities

The Governor's "special responsibilities" defined. 78. It is proposed in the White Paper that the Governor shall have a special responsibility in respect of—

(a) the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of the Province or any part thereof (b) the safeguarding of the 15 legitimate interests of minorities (c) the securing to the members of the Public Services of any rights provided for them by the Constitution and the safeguarding of their legitimate interests (d) the prevention of commercial discrimination, (e) the protection of the rights of any Indian State (f) the administration of areas 20 declared, in accordance with provisions to that behalf, to be partially excluded areas (g) securing the execution of orders lawfully issued by the Governor General¹

The Governors of the North West Frontier Province and of the proposed new Province of Sind are respectively declared to have 25 in addition a special responsibility in respect of—

(h) any matter affecting the Governor's responsibilities as Agent of the Governor-General in the Tribal and the Trans-Border Areas and (i) the administration of the Sukkur Barrage.

79. With regard to (a) the Joint Memorandum of the British India 30- Delegation urges a double limitation on the scope of this special responsibility the first, that the special responsibility itself should be restricted to cases in which the menace arises from subversive movements or activities tending to crimes of violence and secondly, that any action taken by the Governor under it should be confined 35 to the Department of Law and Order. We cannot accept these suggestions. Terrorist, subversive movements and crimes of violence, are no doubt among the graver menaces to the peace or tranquillity of a Province but they do not by any means exhaust the cases in which such a menace may occur and we can see no logical 40- reason for the distinction which the Joint Memorandum seeks to draw. Still less can we see any justification for restricting the Governor's action to the department of law and order by which we suppose is meant the Police Department. There are many other branches of administration in which ill advised measures may give rise to a menace to the peace or tranquillity of the Province and we can readily conceive circumstances in connection with land revenue or public health, to mention no others, which might well 5- have this effect. With regard to (b) the Joint Memorandum suggests that the phrase legitimate interests should be more clearly defined, and that it should be made clear that the minorities referred to are the racial and religious minorities generally included by usage in that expression. We doubt if it would be possible to define 10 legitimate interests any more precisely. The obvious intention is to secure some means by which minorities can be reasonably assured of fair treatment at the hands of majorities and legitimate interests seems to us a very suitable and reasonable formula. Nor do we think that any good purpose would be served by attempting to give a legal 15- definition of minorities, the only effect of which would be to limit the protection which the Governor's special responsibility is intended to afford. No doubt it will be the five or six well recognized and more important minorities in whose interests the Governor's powers will usually be involved, but there are certainly other well-defined sections of the population who may from time to time require protection, and we can see no justification for defining the expression for the purpose of excluding them. We need hardly say that we have not in mind a minority in the political or parliamentary sense, and no reasonable person would, we think, ever so construe the word. With regard to (c), the Joint Memorandum proposes that here also the expression "legitimate interests" should be clearly defined, and that the Governor's special responsibilities should be restricted to the rights and privileges guaranteed by the Constitution. We assume that the intention of the White Paper is to guarantee to public servants not only their legal rights but also equitable treatment, a thing not susceptible in our opinion of legal definition. The authors of the Joint Memorandum would no doubt say that Ministers can be trusted to act in these matters in a reasonable way, and we do not doubt that this is so, but we think that they should also assume that neither will Provincial Governors act unreasonably in discharging the special responsibilities which the Constitution Act will impose upon them. If Ministers in fact act reasonably, as no doubt they will, the occasions on which a Governor will find it necessary to dissent from the advice which they tender to him may never in practice arise.

77 We discuss elsewhere (d), i.e., the prevention of commercial discrimination. With regard to (e), the "rights" here referred to must necessarily mean rights enjoyed by a State in matters not covered by its Instrument of Accession,¹ which may be prejudiced by administrative or legislative action in a neighbouring Province. The duty, as we understand it, is laid on the Governor to secure

Rights of State Partially Excluded

that the balance is held evenly between Province and State, and clearly in a matter of this kind he will be guided by the advice or directions of the Governor-General. With regard to (f), the responsibility for the government of partially excluded (as opposed to wholly excluded) areas will primarily rest upon Ministers, but we agree that, in view of the responsibility which Parliament has assumed towards the inhabitants of the backward and less civilised tracts in India, it is right to impose a special responsibility in this respect upon the Governor.

78 With regard to (g), it is clear that this must be a special responsibility of the Governor. The Governor-General exercises a wide range of powers in responsibility to the Secretary of State and through him to Parliament. The exercise of some of these powers may from time to time require the co-operation of provincial administrations and a Governor must be in a position to give effect to any directions or orders of the Governor-General designed to secure this object, even if their execution may not be acceptable to his own Ministers. We refer elsewhere to the case where a difference of opinion has occurred between Federal and Provincial Ministers in the ministerial sphere, arising out of directions given by the former which the latter are unwilling to obey.¹

orders of Governor-
General

79 With regard to (h), it is apparent that the close connection between the Governor-General's exclusive responsibility for Defence and External Affairs and the administration of the Tribal and other Trans-border Areas which march with the administered districts of the North-West Frontier Province makes a provision of this kind

circumstances

necessary With regard to (i) we agree that this special responsibility is necessary in the case of Sind, in view of the vital influence upon the future finances of the Province of the successful operation of the Sukkur irrigation scheme and of the large financial interest which the Central Government has in it.

(ii) The Governor's Selection of Ministers

Qualifications
proposed for Ministers

80 The White Paper proposes that the Instrument of Instructions shall direct the Governor to select his Ministers in consultation with the person who in his judgment is likely to command the largest following in the legislatures, and to appoint those persons, including so far as possible members of important minority communities, who will best be in a position collectively to command the confidence of the Legislature. It is also proposed that Ministers must be or become within a stated period (by which we understand a period of six or twelve months to be intended) members of the Legislature.²

81 The question how a direction to the Governor to include among his Ministers, so far as possible members of important minority communities is to be reconciled with ministerial responsibility in the accepted sense of that expression, to a Legislature which is itself based on a system of communal representation and in which the numbers of the representatives of the different communities are fixed by statute and unalterable, will be more conveniently discussed later when we examine the more general question of the relation of the Provincial Executive to the Provincial Legislature.¹ We accordingly confine ourselves here to a consideration of the proposal in the White Paper that every Minister shall be or become within a stated period, a member of the Legislature.

Differences of proposal that Ministers should be elected
Legislature.

82. Indian opinion appears to attach great importance to this qualification as securing in the most effective manner control by the Legislature over the Executive. It is unknown to the constitutional law of the United Kingdom but it has long been the rule in this country that a Minister must either find a seat within a reasonable time or resign his appointment, unless the Prime Minister should see fit to recommend him for a peerage so that the qualification exists in practice, if not in law, though during the War there were instances of Ministers who had a seat in neither House. On the other hand we were impressed by the argument that at least in some Provinces the Governor might find it difficult to constitute an efficient Ministry from the members of a small and inexperienced Legislature and it is no doubt true that in India owing to the very small proportion which the educated classes bear to the total population there is no certainty that in the smaller Provinces the Legislatures will always contain men fit or experienced enough to assume the heavy responsibilities which Provincial Autonomy under the new order must necessarily involve. It was, therefore suggested to us that the Governor ought not to be thus restricted in his choice and that he ought to be in a position if the need should arise to select a Minister or Ministers from persons otherwise qualified for appointment but to whom the doubtful pleasures of electioneering might make no appeal.

Suggested
method for meeting difficulty.

83. In the Provinces with a bicameral Legislature in which a nominated element will find a place the difficulty is unlikely to arise if it were understood, or perhaps provided in the Act itself that these nominations were reserved to the Governor's discretion

40 The real difficulty arises in the unicameral Legislatures, most of which are likely to be found in the smaller and poorer Provinces. Various suggestions were made to us (1) that the Governor should be empowered, if he thought fit, to appoint a Minister from outside the Legislature, the Minister so appointed having 45 precisely the same status as other Ministers and sharing their policy and political fortunes, with the right to take part in all proceedings of the Legislature, though not entitled to vote; (2) that in addition to the elected members, there should be one or two members nominated by the Governor, who would be eligible for appointment as Ministers, though not necessarily so appointed, (3) that the Governor should be 5 empowered, if he desired to have an outside Minister, to nominate the person whom he selected as a member ad hoc of the Legislature, and (4) that the Ministers themselves should be empowered, if so requested by the Governor, to co-opt someone from outside and present him to the Governor, for appointment. Of these suggestions, we un-

10 hesitatingly prefer the first. We can see no advantage, and many disadvantages, in the second and third, both of which appear to us to have an air of unreality about them, and we reject the fourth as infringing the Governor's prerogative.

84 We have come to the conclusion, after giving our best 15 consideration to the matter, that it would be wise in the circumstances not to limit the Governor's choice of Ministers in the manner proposed by the White Paper, and that the first of the above suggestions should be adopted. The fear that the control of the Legislature over Ministers would be thereby weakened is, in our 20 opinion, greatly exaggerated, in France, for example, where instances of Ministers appointed from outside the two Chambers are by no means unknown, there seems to be no evidence of any weakening of Parliamentary control over the Governments of which they were members. We cannot suppose for a moment that a 25 Governor would employ a power of this kind for the purpose of appointing a whole Ministry from outside the Legislature, but, if this is thought to be a danger to be guarded against, the matter can be dealt with by appropriate directions in the Instrument of Instructions. The Indian delegates, we think, saw in the unrestricted
30 choice of Ministers a means of re-introducing an official bloc, and it is true that one of the proposals in the White Paper is that the holding of any office under the Crown other than that of Minister shall disqualify for membership of a Provincial Legislature, so that no official could become a Minister, if Membership of the 35 Legislature is a necessary qualification for Ministerial appointments. In our view an official bloc is more correctly defined as a body of members of the Legislature who vote in accordance with official instructions, but who are not themselves Ministers or members of the Government. The presence in the 40 Council of Ministers of a Minister who is chosen from outside the Legislature, even supposing him to be an official (which we do not suggest), could not in any way restrict or diminish the control of the Legislature over Ministers, a Minister so chosen will not be less responsible to the Legislature than any of his colleagues, and 45 he will have to defend his actions against criticisms in the Legislature itself. We see, therefore, nothing inconsistent with constitutional principle in what we now propose, and we are of opinion that it will often be found to add an element of strength.

Governor's choice should not be fettered

affected by amendments of a particular kind, but to give so extensive a power to the Governor seems to us neither necessary nor desirable. In the first place we understand that a large number of the rules deal with routine matters of quite minor importance and are constantly amended in effect on the responsibility of the Inspector General of Police himself and it would clearly be absurd if every amendment of this kind required the Governor's concurrence. On the other hand, it may well be that the subject matter of some of the rules is so vital to the well-being of the police force that they ought not to be amended without at least the Governor's knowledge. We have not been able in the time at our disposal to make a minute study of the rules but if His Majesty's Government after a further examination of the subject came to the conclusion that certain rules were properly included in a category of this kind and made special provision with regard to them, and possibly also with regard to the Police Acts themselves, in the legislative proposals which they will submit to Parliament, we should be prepared to agree nor can we see why a safeguard of this kind need operate in any way to diminish the responsibility for the administration of law and order which, as we have already said, we think should in future rest upon Indian Ministers themselves.

90 There is one other matter which arises in connection with the police and to which we think it convenient to draw attention in this place. It has been represented to us very forcibly that, whatever may be the decision with regard to the transfer of law and order generally special provision ought to be made with regard to that branch of the police which is concerned with the suppression of terrorism. We do not here refer to those members of the police who are occupied in combating terrorism as part of their regular functions in the prevention of crime and maintenance of order but to that which is sometimes known as the Special Branch, a body of carefully selected officers who devote themselves to the collection and sifting of information on which their comrades in the force can subsequently take action. Their work necessarily involves the employment of confidential agents and others from whom the information is obtained and it is stated to us and we see no reason to doubt the fact, that the supply of information derived from these sources would at once cease if the identity of those who furnished it became known or might become known, outside the police force itself. This being so, it has been urged that the operations of the Special Branch ought to be placed under the exclusive control of the Governor since otherwise the organisation which at present exists, and which is an essential instrument in the fight against terrorism would be disrupted and would be difficult, and perhaps impossible to reconstitute.

91. The problem is a difficult one though at the moment it is only of immediate importance in the Province of Bengal. The Special Branch is an integral part of the police force and is in no sense independent of the provincial Inspector-General of Police. It is exclusively concerned with the collection and sifting of information and any executive action which may follow from its investigations is undertaken by the ordinary police force. But if it is impossible to distinguish between the two then (it is said) an Indian Minister who may have to defend subsequently before the Legislature an arrest or prosecution made or begun by his orders, must have the right to satisfy himself that the information is trustworthy in which he is invited to act and the names of the agents from whom it has been obtained could not in the 25 last resort be withheld from him. We think that those who argue thus are not acquainted with the general practice in matters of this kind. We are informed by those who have experience in such matters in this country that in a secret service case the names of agents are in no circumstances disclosed to Ministers, and that 30 (for reasons which we fully appreciate) a case has never been known in which a Minister has even asked for the information.

 We think that Indian Ministers, if and when they take over the administration of law and order, would be wise themselves to adopt so salutary a convention, but we are satisfied that the difficulty 35 arises, not because Indian Ministers are likely to disclose the names of agents or even to demand them, but because the agents have an ineradicable suspicion that the information will in fact become known. So long as this suspicion or belief exists, the consequences are the same, whether it is ill-founded or not.

40 92 We do not think it desirable that the Constitution Act should Powers of Governor.
 vest in the Governor himself the control of the Special Branch.
 On the other hand we can conceive a state of things arising in which the discharge of the special responsibility to which we have referred above might make it necessary for him to direct the 45 Inspector-General of Police in the Province in no circumstances to disclose the source of any information which may be obtained by the Special Branch to any person whatsoever without the Governor's prior approval. It might even be thought advisable to refer to this possibility in his Instrument of Instructions. But the necessity for action of this kind could scarcely arise, unless the efforts of the police in the suppression of terrorism had not the sympathy, or at least failed to gain the support, of Ministers, a possibility which we hope that we may regard as remote, and in that case it would in 5 our opinion be preferable to empower the Governor, with the consent of the Governor-General, to take over and administer himself the whole anti-terrorist organisation until such time as he and the Governor-General are satisfied, perhaps after a change of Ministry, that it can be safely entrusted once more to those whose constitu-10 tional duty it is to see that the law is properly enforced. This would, we think involve the appointment of some person selected by the Governor at his discretion to act as his spokesman for the time being in the Legislature. We might add that it was suggested to us as an alternative proposal that the Special Branches throughout 15 India should in future be under the control of the Governor-General, since there is at the present time an Intelligence Service under the control of the Central Government which necessarily works in close contact with all the provincial police forces. This, however, would involve the creation of a new reserved service under the 20 control of the Governor-General, a course which we should deprecate.

 In our opinion it would be a more convenient arrangement if in future the intelligence work at the Centre in its internal security aspect were assigned to the Department of Defence as part of the latter's normal functions. The central intelligence service would 25 in that case continue to act as a clearing house for information generally, and the local police would be able, and no doubt anxious, to avail themselves of its services, but to impose on the Governor-General any statutory functions in relation to the police administration of a Province seems to us a plan which has nothing to 30 commend it.

Secretary but we think it right that he should in future be known by some other designation, and we suggest for consideration that of Secretary to the Governor

Influence of Governor on working of
government

97 It is clear that the successful working of responsible government in the Provinces will be very greatly influenced by the character and experience of the provincial Governors. We concur with everything which has been said by the Statutory Commission on the part which the Governors have played in the working of the reforms of 1919¹ and we do not think that the part which they will play in the future will be any less important or valuable. We take note here, though the matter is not altogether relevant to the subject which we have been discussing of a suggestion pressed by some of the British India Delegation that in future Governors should always be appointed from the United Kingdom and indeed that there should be a statutory prohibition against the appointment of persons who are members of the Indian Civil Service. We cannot accept this suggestion. We hold strongly the view that His Majesty's selection of Governors ought not to be fettered in any way and that there may be no misunderstanding on the point, we desire to state our belief that, in the future no less than in the past, men in every way fitted for appointment as the Governor of a Province will be found among members of the Civil Service who have distinguished themselves elsewhere in India.

(v) Special Powers of Governor

special powers.

98. It is plain that for the due discharge of his special responsibilities, it may not always suffice for the Governor to be able to dissent from the advice tendered to him by Ministers in some circumstances it may be essential that further powers should be at his disposal. This is recognised in the White Paper in which it is proposed to give the Governor certain legislative and financial powers. The powers which it is proposed to entrust to the Governor in the event of the breakdown in the constitutional machinery may also be considered under this head.

Legislative
powers.

99 As regards legislative powers, the White Paper proposes to empower the Governor at his discretion, to present or cause to be presented, a Bill to the Legislature with a Message that it is essential having regard to any of his special responsibilities, that the Bill should become law before a date specified in the Message, and to declare by Message in respect of any Bill already introduced that it should for similar reasons become law before a stated date in a form specified in the Message.² If before the date specified the Bill is not passed or is not passed in the specified form as the case may be the Governor will be empowered at his discretion to enact it as a Governor's Act either with or without any amendments made by the Legislature after receipt of his Message. Under the present Government of India Act, where a provincial Legislature has refused leave to introduce or has failed to pass in the form recommended by the Governor any Bill relating to a reserved subject the Governor may certify that the passage of the Bill is essential for the discharge of his responsibility for the subject and thereupon the Bill shall be deemed to have passed and shall on signature by the Governor become an Act of the Legislature. It will be seen, therefore, that 5 one difference between the existing procedure and that which is now proposed is that in the former case a certified Bill is deemed to be an Act of the Legislature, whereas in the latter it is declared to be (what indeed it is) a Governor's Act. So far as this difference in nomenclature is concerned, we concur in the proposal of the White 10 Paper, for we can see no possible advantage in describing an Act as the Act of the Legislature, when the Legislature has expressly declined to enact it. But the members of the British India Delegation desired to go further, and, though they did not dissent from giving the Governor the power in appropriate circumstances 15 to enact legislation, urged that he should do so on his own exclusive responsibility, and that the Legislature ought not to be associated with the process in any way. In their view the proposals in the White Paper tended in the first place to blur the respective responsibilities of Governor and Legislature, and in the second to 20 enable the Governor to seek support in the Legislature against his Ministers and thus to undermine the position of the latter.

100 There is much force in the British India argument, and if we thought that the intention, or even the effect, of the proposal were to enable the Governor to go behind the back of his Ministers 25 for the purpose of securing the passage of legislation which they themselves were unwilling to sponsor, we think that the argument would be conclusive. We are not, however, clear that this is necessarily so. We agree that, if a Governor finds it necessary to make use of his special legislative powers, the responsibility for 30 using them must be his alone, and that he ought not to seek to persuade the Legislature to take any part of it upon themselves.
 On the other hand, though it is no less undesirable that the Governor should, save in most exceptional circumstances, exercise a power which is ordinarily the prerogative of the Legislature, there is much 35 to be said for giving the Legislature up to the eleventh hour an opportunity to reconsider legislative proposals which perhaps they have declined for political or party reasons to consider upon the merits, and for thus enabling a Bill to become law by the regular constitutional process, and it would certainly be unfortunate if a 40 Governor found himself compelled to exercise his special powers, when he might be able to achieve his object in some other way. This we conceive to be the intention underlying the White Paper proposals, and, if so, they ought not lightly to be rejected. They also leave the way open for a compromise between Governor and Legislature, 45 in the event of a difference of opinion between the two: for the Governor may, as the result of further discussion, be willing to sacrifice part of a Bill, if he can secure the passage of the remainder, and the Legislature may be willing on their side to pass the Bill, if those particular parts are omitted.

Governor's powers should be exercised independently of Legislature.

101 We doubt if a Governor ought ever to present a Bill to the Legislature which his Ministers have refused to sponsor. If he does so, because he anticipates that he will secure a majority for the Bill, then it must be assumed that his Ministers no longer possess the 5 confidence of the Legislature, and his proper course would be to dismiss them and appoint others in their place. On the other hand, if Ministers are of opinion that there is a reasonable chance of the Bill passing, because there is a change of attitude in the Legislature or on any other ground, then, as it seems to us, it is for Ministers 10 themselves to sponsor the Bill, if they approve it. The logical

Noification

undivided responsibility. We conceive that the intention is to provide also for the possibility of a partial breakdown and to enable the Governor to take over part only of the machinery of government, leaving the remainder to function according to the ordinary law. Thus the Governor might if the breakdown were in the legislative machinery of the Province, still carry on the government with the aid of his Ministers, if they were willing to support him. We are speaking of course of such a case as the refusal of the Legislature to function at all and not merely to lesser conflicts or disputes between it and the Governor. If we are right in our interpretation, we approve the proposals, and we are of opinion that it would be unwise if not impracticable, to specify in any detail the action which the Governor should be authorised to take. A constitutional breakdown implies no ordinary crisis and it is impossible to foresee what measures the circumstances might demand. It is right, therefore, that the Governor should be armed with a general discretionary power to adopt such remedies as the case may require.

Secretary of State and ultimately to Parliament. This is the effect of the White Paper proposal and it is unnecessary for us to comment upon it.

(3) RELATIONS BETWEEN THE PROVINCIAL EXECUTIVE AND LEGISLATURE

Aspects of
of India

107. We have said in an earlier part of this Report that by responsible government we mean a form of government in which the Executive is in some sense accountable to the Legislature and we have pointed out the undeniable fact that, while the Indian demand is for parliamentary government on the British model the essential conditions of parliamentary government as it is understood in the United Kingdom neither exist in India at the present time nor are likely to come into existence for many years to come. For this reason it seems desirable that we should attempt to examine in greater detail the relations between the Executive and the Legislature under the plan proposed in the White Paper.

Composite Ministries proposed by White Paper

108. The White Paper proposes that the Governor shall be directed by his Instrument of Instructions to select his Ministers in consultation with the person who in his judgment is likely to command the largest following in the Legislature and to appoint those persons (including so far as possible members of important minority communities) who will best be in a position collectively to command the confidence of the Legislature. Assuming as we do that the Legislature will be based on a system of communal representation it will be seen that this proposal contemplates the formation of a composite Ministry representative not (as in the United Kingdom) of a single majority party or even of a coalition of parties, but also of minorities as such. We do not suppose that any other plan would commend itself to the minority communities at the present moment and we must, therefore, accept it as a necessary element in the scheme but it is not parliamentary government in the British sense

109 It is our earnest hope that in the future parties may develop in India which will cut across communal lines, but we entertain some doubt whether the proposed directions in the Instrument of Instructions, if literally obeyed, may not operate to prevent both the growth of parties and the formation of homogeneous Ministries. The obligation imposed upon the Governor of including among his Ministers members of important minority communities is no doubt qualified by the words "so far as possible", and much will depend upon the meaning which is to be attached to this qualification. It may be read as meaning that, whenever a member of a minority community is willing to accept office then the Governor is to have no option but to appoint him, and it would be exceedingly unfortunate if a Governor at some future date were thereby prevented from

Desirability of encouraging parties on non-communal lines

* White Paper, Proposal 72

encouraging a healthier development on non-communal lines. We think, therefore, that the formula proposed in the White Paper merits re-examination with a view to giving greater latitude to the Governor. We recognise that nothing ought to be done at the present time which would excite suspicion or distrust in the mind of the minorities and we have no doubt that for many years to come the minorities will expect to be represented in every Ministry, but we should be sorry to think that this is to be an eternal and immutable feature of Indian politics.

110 We have emphasised the vital importance in India of the Executive. It has seemed to us in the course of our discussions with the British India delegates that in their anxiety to increase the prerogatives of the Legislature, they have been apt to overlook the functions of the Executive, an attitude not perhaps surprising in those to whom at the present time the Legislature offers the main field of political activity. But if the responsibility for government is henceforward to be borne by Indians themselves they will do well to remember that to magnify the Legislature at the expense of the Executive is to diminish the authority of the latter and to weaken the sense of responsibility of both. The function of the Executive is to govern and to administer; that of the Legislature to vote supply, to criticize, to educate public opinion, and to legislate, and great mischief may result from attempts by the latter to invade the executive sphere. The belief that parliamentary government is incompatible with a strong Executive is no doubt responsible for the distrust with which parliamentary institutions have come to be regarded in many parts of the world. The United Kingdom affords a sufficient proof that a strong Executive may co-exist even with an omnipotent Parliament if the necessary conditions are present, and the strength of the Executive in this country may, we think be attributed with not more justice to the support of a disciplined party than to the inveterate and cherished tradition of Parliament that the prerogatives of the Legislature are not to be jealously or factiously asserted in such a way as to prevent the King's Government from being carried on. "His Majesty's Opposition" is not an idle phrase but embodies a constitutional doctrine of great significance.

A strong Executive not incompatible with parliamentary government

111 A composite Ministry, though for the moment we accept it as inevitable, seems to us unlikely for some time to produce a strong Executive since it will not have the support of a disciplined party, and the tradition of which we have spoken is as yet unknown in India. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that its members will tend to regard themselves as responsible to the various communities whom they represent rather than to the Legislature as a whole. The British India delegates laid indeed great stress upon the collective responsibility of the Provincial Ministries and in their 45 Joint Memorandum have urged that the Instrument of Instructions should definitely contain a direction to the Governor that the collective responsibility of Ministers is to be introduced forthwith.

This seems to us to confuse cause and effect and we confess our inability to understand how collective responsibility could be thus introduced by any directions to a Governor. The Governor can and we hope will, insist that when his Ministers advise him, they do so with a single voice. The collective responsibility of Ministers 5 to the Legislature is, however, not a rule of law to be put into operation at discretion, but a constitutional convention which only usage and practice can define or enforce, and which depends no less upon the attitude of the Legislature than upon that of Ministers themselves. A wise Governor will seek to encourage political conditions 10 which favour the growth of this convention but since it is the outcome and not the cause of ministerial solidarity it is as likely to be hindered as to be helped by artificial devices which take no account of the realities of the situation. It is an element of strength in an Executive and for that reason we attach great importance to it 15 but in our judgment its evolution and adoption are matters which must be left to Indians themselves.

112. A Ministry such as we have described, with no permanent majority on which to rely and without the bond of a common political faith may well find it difficult to assert its authority over 20 the Legislature and here we think that a very real danger lies. Nothing could be more disastrous to India than a system under which the Executive is at the mercy of a number of constantly shifting groups in the Legislature. The account given by the Statutory Commission of the working of the existing provincial 25 Constitution is not very encouraging. Governors in choosing their Ministers, they observe, have had an exceptionally difficult task. It could seldom be predicted what following a Minister would have in the Legislature quite apart from the fact that his acceptance of office was often followed owing to personal rivalries, by the detachment 30 of some of his previous adherents. The statement is amply confirmed by our own information and it should also be remembered that Ministers will not in future be able to rely upon the official bloc which in the words of the Statutory Commission has helped to decrease the instability of the balance of existing groups 35 in the Legislature and has made the tenure of office of Ministers far less precarious. It may be said that these difficulties will disappear under responsible government. We hope that it will be so and we should not have recommended that the experiment be made if we were not satisfied that under no other system can Indians learn how 40 to govern themselves. But we are bound to add that in our opinion a sense of corporate responsibility in Legislatures constituted wholly on a communal basis is likely to be of slow growth and that the education of provincial legislatures may sometimes prove an expensive luxury to the Province. We have therefore considered in what way 45 it may be possible to strengthen the Executive and to make its authority more effective.

113 An Executive must necessarily lack authority unless it can be certain of a reasonable length of tenure, and our attention has been drawn to more than one device for the purpose of securing this end. Among these was a suggestion that the Ministry, after its appointment by the Governor, should present itself to the Legislature and demand a vote of confidence, and that when this had been accorded it should remain in office for a fixed period, which might be from one to three years, and should only be removable (unless previously dismissed by the Governor) by a vote of non-confidence, passed by something more than a bare majority of votes. Under this proposal, a Ministry would remain in office, even though the Legislature might refuse supply, and the responsibility for any untoward consequences which might ensue would be upon Legislature alone. This plan, attractive at first sight, does not seem to us a workable one. A legislature, determined to withhold support from a new Ministry, might refuse time after time to give the initial vote of confidence and the result would be a complete deadlock. Secondly, the existence of a Ministry which had not in fact the confidence of the Legislature could in practice be made impossible, whether or not the formal vote of non-confidence was passed, for we doubt whether any Ministers would be willing to continue in office, even though they enjoyed a statutory tenure, if they could secure neither supply nor the passage of any part of their legislative programme. There is not in our opinion any effective method of securing by statutory enactment under a system of parliamentary government permanence of tenure to a Ministry faced by a consistently hostile Legislature, and to this we might add that nothing is less likely to promote a sense of responsibility in the Legislature than the knowledge that even if only for a specified and limited period, the Executive is irremovable.

Methods for securing stability of the Executive

114 We see, however, no reason why a hostile vote, even on a demand for supply, should always involve the fate of a Ministry, and no doubt in the course of time the matter will come to be regulated by constitutional conventions. Much will depend upon the Governor and on the support which he is able to give to the Ministers of his choice. It has often been assumed that, when the Governor finds himself compelled to make use of his special powers the occasion will ordinarily be a difference between himself and his Ministers. We think on the contrary that differences are much more likely to occur, where the Legislature acts irresponsibly, between the Legislature on the one hand, and the Ministry, supported by the Governor, on the other, and where this is so, it seems to us that circumstances might well arise in which the use of his special powers by the Governor or an intimation to the Legislature of his intention to use them would contribute to the strength of a Ministry which was willing to co-operate with him. Ministers would not of course be entitled of their own motion to advise the Governor to make use of his special powers: it would be the Governor himself who would

Governor's
special powers
to support

request their advice. But Ministers if prepared to advise would have to accept responsibility to the Legislature for any recommendation since the Governor's special powers are not intended to be used for the purpose of enabling Ministers to escape a responsibility which properly belongs to them. We think however that the judicious use by the Governor of these powers in the manner indicated (even though they are limited to the sphere of his special responsibilities) might often prove invaluable for the purpose of strengthening a Ministry which is willing to carry on the necessary functions of government but cannot do so owing to factions and irresponsible obstruction in the Legislature, and which the Governor is satisfied can not be replaced by any alternative Ministry which would not encounter similar treatment

The reserve powers of the Governor

115 Under most Constitutions, the power of dissolution is a potent instrument in bringing an irresponsible Legislature to its senses for 15 members are thereby brought face to face with constituents to whom they must justify their conduct. It will be available in the Indian Provinces, according to the scheme of the White Paper at the Governor's discretion. This, we agree, is as it should be and we think that even the threat to use it will often enable a Governor to 20 give extremely effective support to his Ministry but we do not forget that under a system of communal representation even a general election is likely to produce a Legislature with the same complexion as its predecessor at least until the time which may be very far distant when political parties are more independent of 25 communal divisions. But even if the constitutional machinery should break down altogether the White Paper provides a means whereby the King's Government may still be carried on. We have already drawn attention to the proposal that the Governor should in such an emergency be empowered to assume to himself (subject 30 to the overriding authority of Parliament) all such powers vested by law in any provincial authority as appear to him to be necessary for the administration of the affairs of the Province and therefore in the last resort he could suspend the Legislature and for the time being administer the Province without it. Here also we think that, 35 if his Ministers were willing to support him, and to take the responsibility of doing so he might properly inform them of his willingness to exercise his powers upon their advice, subject always to such directions as he might receive from the Governor-General. Provisions of this kind, as the Statutory Commission rightly observe are no 40 repudiation of the principle of self-government they cannot come into play unless the principle of self-government is itself repudiated.¹ We hope and are willing to believe, that it will never become necessary to put them into operation but we are none the less persuaded that their inclusion in the Constitution will have a bene- 45 ficial effect. Nothing is more calculated to quicken a sense of responsibility in the Legislatures than a clear perception of the inevitable consequences of irresponsibility and though it may seem paradoxical to say so we think that the existence in the background of these reserve powers of the Governor may well prove the real and most effective guarantee for the development of a genuine system of responsible government

Solution of the problem lies in Indian hands.

116 We may be thought to have laid too great emphasis upon the difficulties likely to arise in the working of the new Constitution in an Indian Province but we have endeavoured to describe the situation as it has presented itself to us without prejudice or exaggeration and if we have emphasized its difficulties it is because 10 we are anxious that Indians should not be misled by deceptive analogies with the constitutional practice of the United Kingdom. Responsible government is not as it has sometimes seemed to us that they regard it, an automatic device or even a machine running

15 on a motive power of its own. It postulates conditions which Indians themselves have skill to create, nor is a technique which the British people have painfully developed in the course of many generations to be acquired in India in the twinkling of an eye. The success of the experiment which we advocate can only be proved by 20 its results, and the political education both of the Legislatures and of the electorate is likely to be a slow process. But we are none the less convinced that Indians must be given the opportunity of purchasing their own experience, and we are at one with the Statutory Commission in seeing no future for responsible government in India unless 25 the difficulties to which we have thought it right to draw attention are not directly faced and in the end surmounted.

(4) THE PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURE

Unicameral and Bicameral Legislatures

117 The White Paper proposes that in each Governor's Province 30 there shall be a Provincial Legislature consisting, except in Bengal, the United Provinces, and Bihar, of the King, represented by the Governor, and a Legislative Assembly. In the three Provinces named, it is proposed that the Legislature shall consist of the King, represented by the Governor, and a Legislative Council as well as a 35 Legislative Assembly. It is also proposed that after a period of ten years, a bicameral Legislature may abolish its Legislative Council, and that a unicameral Legislature may present an address to the Crown praying for the establishment of a Legislative Council.¹

Provincial Legislatures

118 We are of opinion that Legislative Councils should also be 40 established in Bombay and Madras, where the conditions are substantially the same as in Bengal and the United Provinces. Apart from this, we concur in the proposals of the White Paper, subject to certain small changes in the composition of the Legislative Councils in Bengal, the United Provinces, and Bihar, and our recommendations

Second

for all five Councils are set out in an Appendix to this part of our Report.¹ We think that where, after the ten-year period, a Province with a unicameral Legislature seeks to have a second Chamber, it ought to be allowed to indicate in the Address which 5 it presents to the Crown the size and composition of the Chamber which it desires to have. We do not doubt that the Crown would always endeavour to ascertain the wishes of the Province, but the Constitution Act should make it clear that the Province has the right to inform the Crown what its wishes are.

10 The Composition of the Legislatures

119 The White Paper sets out in detail the proposed composition of each Provincial Legislature, specifying both the allocation of seats and the method of election to them.² In the case of the Legislative Assemblies, these are based upon the Communal Award issued by 15 His Majesty's Government on August 4th, 1932, with such modifications as have been rendered necessary (1) by the later proposal to create a new Province of Orissa, and (2) by the so-called Poona Pact of September 25th, 1932. It will be recalled that owing to the failure of the various communities to reach any agreement on 20 the subject, principally because of a radical divergence of opinion on the vital question of separate electorates and the distribution of communal seats, His Majesty's Government reluctantly undertook the task of devising themselves a scheme for the composition of the new Legislatures. When their Award was published they announced their determination not to entertain 25 any suggestions for its alteration or modification which were not supported by all parties affected, but that if any of the communities mutually agreed upon a practicable alternative scheme they would be prepared to recommend to Parliament that that alternative should be substituted for the corresponding provisions in the Award. In the 30 Award special arrangements were made to secure representation for the Depressed Classes. These were criticised by Mr Gandhi as introducing an artificial division between two parts of the Hindu community, and he expressed his intention of fasting unto death as a protest against them. Thereupon negotiations were 35 initiated between the representatives of the caste Hindus and of the Depressed Classes, and an agreement resulted which was embodied in the Poona Pact. This agreement in the view of His Majesty's Government was within the terms of the announcement made by them and therefore properly to be included as an integral 40 part of the Communal Award.

The Communal Award and the

Effect of the Poona Pact.

190 The substance of the Poona Pact is the reservation to the Depressed Classes of a number of seats out of the seats classified as general seats in the Award which means in effect out of Hindu seats since Hindus form the great bulk of the general electorates. These 45

I for p.
White Paper Appendix III

reserved seats will however, be filled by an unusual form of double election. All members of the Depressed Classes who are registered on the general electoral roll of certain constituencies will elect a panel of four candidates belonging to their own body and the four persons who receive the highest number of votes in this primary 5 election will be the only candidates for election to the reserved seat but the candidate finally elected to the reserved seat will be elected by the general electorate that is to say by caste Hindus and by members of the Depressed Classes alike. The number of seats reserved for the Depressed Classes under the Poona 10 Pact is practically double the number reserved under the Communal Award but whereas under the latter there was to be a direct election to those seats by a separate Depressed Classes electorate there will now be an election by the general electorate although the candidates for election will have been previously 15 selected by means of a primary election at which members of the Depressed Classes only will be entitled to vote. Since the Pact does not and indeed could not increase the total number of seats assigned by the Communal Award to the different Legislatures, it follows that any increase in the seats reserved for the Depressed Classes must 20 involve a diminution in the seats which will be available for caste Hindus.

The White Paper proposal
accepted.

191 The Communal Award was criticised by more than one witness who appeared before us on the ground that it operates inequitably in the case of Bengal and even more inequitably with the modifica- 25 tions resulting from the Poona Pact. There was also criticism of the Award from other Provinces in which the Hindus are in a minority but elsewhere the Award appears to have met with acceptance and we entertain no doubt that if any attempt were now made to alter or modify it the consequences would be disastrous. 30 The arrangement which it embodies appears to us to be well thought out and balanced and to disturb any part of it would be to run the risk of upsetting the whole. It accepts indeed the principle of separate electorates for the Muhammadan, Sikh, Indian 35 Christian, Anglo-Indian, and European communities, but we recognize that this is an essential and inevitable condition of any new constitutional scheme. We may deplore the mutual distrust of which the insistence on this demand by the minorities is so ominous a symptom, but it is unhappily a factor in the situation which, 40 cannot be left out of account, nor do we think that we can usefully add anything to what we have already said on the subject. We accept therefore the proposals in the White Paper for the composition of the Legislative Assemblies. As regards the Poona Pact, we are satisfied that it was made between persons who may properly be 45 regarded as representative of the caste Hindus on the one hand and of the Depressed Classes on the other, and for that reason we think that it falls within the terms of the announcement made by His Majesty's Government and that it ought not to be disturbed. We say frankly that we do not care greatly for it, and still less for the methods which brought it into existence. We are of opinion that the original proposals of His Majesty's Government constituted a more equitable settlement of the general communal question, 5 but the Pact was made by accredited leaders of the communities concerned, and was acquiesced in at the time by the communities themselves, or at least elicited no protest, and, if we say no more, it is because we should be reluctant to believe that Indian political leaders, who presumably look forward to occupying positions of 10 responsibility when India achieves self-government, will in the future be willing to be influenced by, or to yield to, pressure of the kind which was exerted at Poona two years ago.

122 The Communal Award did not extend to the Legislative Composition of Council of any Province. The composition of these Councils which Second 15 is set out in the White Paper is however based upon the same Chambers. principles as the Communal Award, but, since the Legislative Councils are much smaller bodies than the Legislative Assemblies and it would be impossible therefore to provide in them for the exact equivalent of all the interests represented in the Lower House, 20 it is proposed to include a certain number of nominated seats to be filled by the Governor at his discretion and accordingly available for the purpose of redressing any possible inequality. We think that this is a reasonable arrangement, and we have included provision for it in the detailed recommendations which are set 25 out in the Appendix above referred to.

 the population of British India. It will be recalled that the 30 Southborough Committee in 1919, on whose recommendations the present franchise is based, were of opinion that the time was not ripe for any extension of the franchise to women, but Parliament required the Electoral Rules made under the Government of India Act to be so drawn as to enable the Provincial Councils to pass resolutions 35 admitting women to the franchise on the same terms as men, and resolutions for that purpose have in fact been passed in every Province. But, since the franchise is in the main a property qualification and few Indian women are property owners in their own right, the number of women thus admitted to the franchise 40 was very small and does not at the present time amount to more than about 315,000.

Franchise
Committee.

124. The Statutory Commission were of opinion that the existing franchise was too limited and recommended that it should be extended so as to enfranchise about 10 per cent. of the total population and they laid a special emphasis upon the need for 45 increasing the ratio of women to men voters. In 1932, between the Second and Third Sessions of the Round Table Conference a Franchise Committee, which was presided over by one of our own number was appointed by His Majesty's Government for the purpose of examining the whole subject with a view to an increase of the electorate to a figure not less than the 10 per cent. of the population suggested by the Statutory Commission nor more than the 25 per cent. suggested at the First Session of the Round Table Conference. 5 We are greatly indebted to the admirable and exhaustive Report of the Franchise Committee, which reached its conclusions after prolonged and intensive discussions in India with the Provincial Governments and with Provincial Franchise Committees and we are satisfied that their recommendations have met with general support from Indian public opinion expressed not only in India but also at the Third Session of the Round Table Conference in the evidence of the witnesses who appeared before us, and in the discussions which we have had with the British-India delegates. 15

The proposals
in the White Paper

125. The proposals of His Majesty's Government for the Provincial Franchise are set out in Appendix V to the White Paper and are essentially based with certain modifications of minor importance only save in the case of the women's franchise, on the Report of the Franchise Committee. We are informed that the proposals have the 20 general support of the Government of India and of the Provincial Governments. The basis of the franchise proposed is essentially, as at present, a property qualification (that is to say payment of land revenue or of rent in towns, tenancy or assessment to income tax) supplemented by an educational qualification and by certain 25 special qualifications designed to secure an adequate representation of women and to enfranchise approximately 10 per cent. of the Depressed Classes (called in Appendix V Scheduled Castes) by the enfranchisement of retired, pensioned and discharged officers, non-commissioned officers and men of His Majesty's Regular Forces 30 and by the provision of a special electorate for the seats reserved for special interests, such as labour, landlords and commerce. The individual qualifications vary according to the circumstances of the different Provinces but the general effect of the proposals is to enfranchise approximately the same classes and categories of the 35 population in all Provinces alike.

Estimate of
proposed

126. We were warned and can readily believe that pending the preparation of Electoral Rolls the figures furnished to us must of necessity be regarded as only approximate. It is, however, estimated that the proposals in the White Paper would if adopted create a 40 male electorate of between 29 000 000 and 29 000 000, and a female electorate of over 8 000 000 as compared with the present figures of 7 000 000 and 3 150 000 that is to say 14 per cent. of the total population of British India would be enfranchised as compared with the present 3 per cent. and the proposals, therefore go beyond the 45 percentage suggested by the Statutory Commission and are nearly midway between the maximum and minimum percentages suggested by the First Round Table Conference.

127 We are satisfied on the information before us that the proposals taken as a whole are calculated to produce an electorate representative of the general mass of the population and one which will not deprive any important section of the community of the means of giving expression to its opinions and desires. The proposals will in the case of most Provinces redress the balance between town and country, which is at the present time too heavily weighted in favour of urban areas, they will secure a representation for women, for the Depressed Classes, for industrial labour, and for special interests, and they will enfranchise the great bulk of the small landholders, of the small cultivators, of the urban ratepayers, as well as a substantial section of the poorer classes.

128 The difficulties which must always attach to any great and sudden extension of the franchise, both in connection with the compilation of the electoral roll and in the actual conduct of elections, are mainly administrative in India, because literacy is rare and the number of persons available to act as efficient Returning Officers extremely limited. These are practical obstacles which ardent reformers are sometimes apt to forget but we are informed that, while the strain of the first election will undoubtedly be considerable, the electorates proposed, subject to certain minor modifications and to one more important modification which we recommend below in the case of Bihar and Orissa, are accepted by the responsible authorities as administratively practicable. The existing system of election is the direct system which has been in force since 1920, and appears on the whole to have worked well. The Franchise Committee after an exhaustive investigation of possible alternatives recommended its retention, and they have the support both of the authorities in India and of Indian public opinion. The proposals in the White Paper are accordingly based upon direct election by territorial constituencies in the case of the various communities, special arrangements being made for election in the case of the constituencies which represent special interests. We are informed that His Majesty's Government are not yet in a position to submit their final proposals for the method of election to the seats reserved for women or for the qualifications to be prescribed in the case of certain of the constituencies representing special interests. These matters are still under investigation in India and proposals with regard to them must depend on the result of further expert examination.

The proposals administratively practicable.

129 We have carefully examined a suggestion to substitute for direct election in territorial constituencies an indirect system of election by means of local groups. At first sight an arrangement of this nature would appear to have the advantage of widening the basis of the franchise, of giving an equal vote at the primary stage to every adult, of facilitating voting by the primary elector, and of securing a more experienced and intelligent secondary elector, and having regard to these considerations, we felt it our duty, despite the fact that discussion and experiment in India had led the Indian Franchise Committee to reject it, again to consider its practicability. The effect of the evidence given before us by witnesses of great experience has however been to show that, superficially attractive as a system of group election may be the objections to it in existing conditions in India are decisive. We have been especially impressed by the administrative difficulties involved in constituting electoral groups, given the existence of caste and the reality of the communal problem, and by the argument that faction runs so high in many Indian villages that group elections would inevitably become highly contested and that it would be necessary to provide for them all the machinery of an ordinary election. We were also informed not only that conditions in the villages had changed so materially of late that the circumstances which some six or seven years ago made it justifiable to put forward a proposal for the use of the group system no longer existed, but that there was no real support for the introduction of such a system either from public or from official opinion in India. In the light of our further investigation of this question we are satisfied that in the case of the Provincial Legislatures the balance of advantage clearly lies in present conditions in retaining the system of direct election.

130. We regard the franchise proposals in the White Paper as generally satisfactory, subject to the modifications which we indicate below. In the case of the general franchise we think that only one modification of substance is necessary. In Bihar and Orissa it is proposed that the qualification in rural areas shall be based upon payment of the chaukidari tax at the minimum rate of six annas per annum but since the White Paper was laid before Parliament the Provincial Government after further investigation have reported that administrative considerations make it impossible to deal with so large an electorate as this franchise would create. We recommend that, in view of this undoubted difficulty, the rural franchise in Bihar and Orissa should be raised from six annas to nine annas and we also recommend that in view of the dislocation caused by the recent earthquake the general rural franchise in the Province should as a temporary measure be fixed as twelve annas for the purpose of the first election under the new Constitution¹. We recognise that these recommendations, if adopted will produce in Bihar and Orissa a percentage of enfranchisement much smaller than in any other Province but we think that they are justified by the special circumstances of the case. We also recommend as part of the arrangements which have been made with His Exalted Highness the Nizam in connection with the Berars, that in the case of Berar constituencies the educational qualification should include the passing of a corresponding examination in Hyderabad and that the military service qualification should cover retired pensioned or discharged officers, non-commissioned officers or soldiers of His Exalted Highness's regular forces.

Corresponding modifications will be necessary for Sambalpur and Santhal Parganas for which a special franchise is proposed in the White Paper

Women's franchise proposals compared with Franchise Committee's recommendations.

131. The present ratio of women to men electors for the Provincial Legislatures is approximately 1 : 20. The recommendations of the Franchise Committee would increase the ratio to 1 : 4.5 by extending the franchise to all women (1) who possess a property qualification in their own right (2) who are the wives or widows of men with the property qualification for the present Provincial Legislatures (slightly different qualifications are proposed for Bihar and Orissa and for the Central Provinces) and (3) who have an educational qualification of literate (this last qualification to be registered only on application by the potential voter). These recommendations are estimated to produce a women's electorate of some 6,000,000. The proposals in the White Paper are identical with those of the Franchise Committee save that women qualified in respect of property held by a husband are required to make application to be placed on the electoral roll, and that the educational standard has in most cases been substantially raised. We are informed that on the latest estimates available, these proposals would produce a women's electorate of some 6,000,000 as against a male electorate of between 28,000,000 and 29,000,000, a ratio approximately equivalent to that recommended by the Franchise Committee. But of these 6,000,000 only some 2,000,000, that is to say, women qualified to vote in respect of the ownership of property in their own right, would automatically be placed upon the roll, for the remainder, who would be qualified in respect either of property held by a husband or of education, an application to the Returning Officer would be required. We have received very strong representations from representatives of women's organisations and from representative women both in this country and in India that the effect of this proposal would be to prejudice very seriously the position of women under the new Constitution. On the other hand, we are informed that the authorities in India view with apprehension any proposals which would substantially increase the administrative difficulties likely in any event to be caused in polling the new and extended electorates, and they have urged also the importance of giving full weight in connection with the women's franchise to Indian social conditions.

132 Apart from the difficulties involved in the retention of the "application" requirement, we have received strong representations in favour of the substitution of the literacy qualification (to be registered on application) recommended by the Franchise Committee for the qualification of an educational standard proposed in the White Paper. It has been urged before us that in many Provinces the educational standard proposed in the White Paper is so high that it will seriously prejudice the legitimate claims of women in general, and in particular the woman who has been educated at home. Representations have also been made to us in favour of the extension of the franchise to the wives of men with the military service qualification for the vote and the pensioned widows and mothers of Indian officers, non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the Regular forces.

women's

We have given anxious consideration to all these questions. We concur in everything which has been said by the Statutory Commission on the necessity for improving the status and extending the influence of the women of India and it is in our opinion impossible to exaggerate the importance of securing in the new Constitution a substantial increase of enfranchised women voters. "The women's movement in India" the Commission observe, "holds the key of progress, and the results it may achieve are incalculably great. It is not too much to say that India cannot reach the position to which it aspires in the world until its women play their due part as educated citizens."¹ This is profoundly true and must be realised by every Indian who has the interests of his country at heart. We are only too well aware of the formidable obstacles which every reformer in this field will encounter, and we cannot forget the painful impression made upon us by one witness, claiming (we hope and believe without justification) to represent the great majority of orthodox Hindus, part of whose evidence could only be construed as approving, or at least condoning, the dreadful practice of suttee. We are therefore all the more convinced of the necessity for strengthening the position of women under the new Constitution, and we are not satisfied in the light of the discussions which have taken place that the proposals in the White Paper are adequate to achieve this object. We are particularly impressed by the unfortunate consequences likely to follow from the application' requirement, though we fully recognise that under existing conditions there are strong arguments 25- in favour of it which can be adduced. We sympathise also with the contention that the standard of the educational qualification is too high, and we are wholly in agreement with those who desire to enfranchise the wives of men with the military service qualification for the vote, and the pensioned widows and mothers of Indian officers, 30 non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the Regular forces.

Modifications
in White Paper proposals
recommended

133. In these circumstances, after a careful examination of the whole problem and in the light of further enquiries which have been made at our request by the Government of India and the local Governments, we recommend the following modifications in the 35- White Paper proposals for the women's franchise and we record our opinion that it should not be beyond the administrative capacity of the Provincial Governments to give effect to them, even though they may involve some temporary difficulties in the early days of the new Constitution —(1) that the application requirement 40 should be dispensed with in the case of women qualified in respect of a husband's property in Bengal, Bihar and Orissa the Central Provinces, and in urban areas in the United Provinces (2) that in Bombay the Central Provinces, the United Provinces, the Punjab and Assam a literacy qualification should be substituted as the educa- 45- tional qualification (3) that in Madras, Bengal the United Provinces, the Central Provinces, the Punjab and Bihar and Orissa the wives of men with the military service qualification for the vote, and pensioned widows and mothers of Indian officers, non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the Regular forces should be enfranchised, registration in this case being on application only and (4) that in cases in which registration will still be only on application such steps as are possible should be taken to mitigate the deterrent effect of this requirement on the registration of votes by 5- women e.g. by permitting application by the husband (subject to suitable penalties in the event of false statements, etc.) on behalf of a wife, and by the entry of a woman's name as wife of A.B.C. in cases in which, for social or religious reasons, there is any objec- 10 tion to the entry of the actual name on the electoral roll.

Recommendations with regard to women's franchise.

134. Before leaving this subject we wish to place on record our view that it is important to attain at as early a date as possible, and if practicable before the second election under the new Constitution the ratio of not less than approximately one woman to five men electors, save possibly in Bihar and Orissa, which was recommended 15 by the Indian Franchise Committee. We understand that in most Provinces under the proposals embodied in the White Paper with the modifications proposed by us above, the ratio of women to men eligible to exercise the franchise will be higher than 1/5 but the deterrent effect of the application requirement, so long as it is 20- necessary to retain it particularly in the case of women qualified in respect of a husband's property is likely in practice to produce a much less favourable ratio of women to men on the electoral registers. In certain Provinces, moreover the ratio even of women eligible to vote to men may apparently be less favourable than 1/5. The 25- remedy for this situation is in our opinion the withdrawal of the “application” requirement, at any rate in the case of women qualified in respect of a husband's property, at as early a date as practicable, with a consequent increase in the number of women on the electoral roll. We are in favour also of the lowering of the educational standard for women to literacy in those Provinces in which a higher standard is now proposed not later than the second election under the new Constitution, this should result in the Provinces in question in a further increase in the number of women eligible to exercise the franchise.

135 The Franchise Committee recommended the adoption of the Upper Primary Standard as a general educational qualification for men. The White Paper substitutes a higher standard in certain Provinces. It has been represented to us that the adoption of a high educational qualification, and in particular of the matriculation standard, would have an unfortunate result on male education and would discriminate against the boy attending the vernacular middle school in favour of the boy matriculating in the secondary school. This question has at our request been further examined by the Government of India and the Provincial Governments, though they admit that there may be some force in the criticism, they do not consider the risks involved as serious enough to call for any modification of the proposal in the White Paper, and we do not feel able after considering the matter, to differ from their conclusion.

The education qualification for men.

136 We desire in conclusion to draw attention to the question of election expenses and corrupt practices. The White Paper proposes that, save as otherwise provided in the Constitution Act itself, the Provincial Legislatures should be empowered to make provision for matters connected with the conduct of elections, but that until they do so existing laws or rules, including laws or rules providing for the prohibition and punishment of corrupt practices or election offences, should remain in force. The Statutory Commission observe that they have no wish to over-emphasise, but that they could not disregard the indications to them in more Provinces than one of the presence and effects of corruption, and they urge therefore that suitable limits should be defined and enforced for election outlay, the existing law being in their opinion inadequate¹. We think that this is a matter which may properly engage the attention of His Majesty's Government, and it may be thought desirable that the Constitution Act itself should embody provisions with regard to it.

Election expenses and corrupt practice

137 The question of a future extension of franchise is one which cannot be divorced from the question of other amendments of the Constitution Act. We do not therefore discuss it in this place and reserve our observations for a later part of our Report, in which the whole problem of what may conveniently be called Constituent Powers is considered².

Future extension of franchise

Powers of Provincial Legislatures

138 We have referred elsewhere to the Lists in Appendix VI of the White Paper, which set out the subjects with respect to which the Provincial Legislatures will have the power of making laws for the peace and good government of the Province, an exclusive power in one case (List II) and in the other a power exercisable concurrently with the Federal Legislature (List III), and further discussion of them is unnecessary here. Certain restrictions on these legislative powers are however proposed. In the first place the Provincial Legislatures will not be competent to make any law affecting the Sovereign or the Royal Family, the sovereignty or dominion of the Crown over any part of British India, the law of British nationality the Army Air Force, and Naval Discipline, Acts, or the Constitution Act itself save in the last case in so far as the Constitution Act otherwise provide.³ Few if any of these subjects are likely to come within the scope of the legislative powers of the Provincial Legislatures, as defined by Lists II and III and the restriction is therefore more apparent than real, though we agree that it is a proper one. The Legislatures will also have no power to make certain laws of a discriminatory kind a subject which it will be more convenient to discuss later.⁴ Secondly the consent of the Governor General given at his discretion will be required to the introduction in a Provincial Legislature of legislation which (1) repeals, amends or is repugnant to any Act of Parliament extending to British India or any Governor General's Act or Ordinance or (2) which affects any Department reserved to the control of the Governor General, or (3) which affects the procedure regulating criminal proceedings against European British subjects. Thirdly the consent of the Governor given at his discretion will be required to the introduction of legislation (1) which repeals, amends, or is repugnant to a Governor's Act or Ordinance or (2) which affects religion or religious rites and usages.

The White Paper proposals approved.

139 We have little comment to make upon these proposals. It was indeed suggested to us that the necessity for the Governor's consent to the introduction of legislation affecting religious rites and usages might prejudice attempts to promote valuable social reforms. We do not think that social reform is likely in the least to suffer by its retention and we are clearly of opinion that it would be unwise for the present to abandon a safeguard which is already in existence and which might prove very necessary at times of religious or communal disturbance. We had also thought at first that a Provincial Legislature ought not to be empowered (as they are not empowered at present) to pass a law which repeals or is repugnant to an Act of Parliament extending to British India even though the prior consent of the Governor to its introduction in the Legislature might be required. We understand however that the great bulk of the existing law in India is the work of Indian legislative bodies and that there are in fact very few Acts of Parliament (apart from those relating to subjects on which it is proposed that the Legislatures shall have no power to legislate at all) which form part of the Indian statute book, and fewer still dealing with matters which will fall within the provincial sphere. In these circumstances we think that the proposal should stand but the Governor's Instrument of Instructions might perhaps direct him to reserve bills which appear to him to fall within this category.

Governor's assent to Bills

140 The proposals with regard to the Government's assent to Bills are in standard constitutional form.¹ They provide that the Governor may at his discretion either assent to a Bill or refuse his assent, or may reserve the Bill for the consideration of the Governor General who may in his turn either assent or withhold his assent or reserve the Bill for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure. We note a proposal whereby the Governor would be empowered to return a Bill to the Legislature for reconsideration in whole or in part, together with such amendments, if any, as he may recommend. A provision of this kind (which has Dominion as well as Indian precedent in its favour) may, we think, prove extremely useful for the purpose of avoiding or mitigating a conflict between the Governor or perhaps the Governor and his Ministers, and the Legislature, and will afford opportunities for compromise which would not otherwise be available.

141 It is proposed that the powers of a Provincial Legislature shall not extend to any part of the Province which is declared to be an "Excluded Area" or a "Partially Excluded Area". In relation to the former, the Governor will himself direct and control the administration, in the case of the latter he is declared to have a special responsibility. In neither case will any Act of the Provincial Legislature apply to the Area, unless by direction of the Governor given at his discretion, with any exceptions or modifications which he may think fit. The Governor will also be empowered at his discretion to make regulations having the force of law for the peace and good government of any Excluded or Partially Excluded Area, but subject in this case to the prior consent of the Governor-General. We have already expressed our approval of the principle of Excluded Areas, and we accept the above proposals as both necessary and reasonable.¹

Procedure in the Legislatures

142 The proposals in the White Paper are rightly designed to give a Provincial Legislature ample power to regulate its own procedure and business, but we note with approval that the Governor is to be empowered at his discretion, after consultation with the presiding officer of the Legislature, to make rules regulating procedure and the conduct of business in relation to matters arising out of or affecting, any of his special responsibilities, and that any rules made by him for this purpose will prevail over any rule made by the Legislature itself which may conflict or be inconsistent with them.²

143 The proposals with regard to financial procedure seem to us generally to be well considered. They are based upon the principle, which must always be the foundation of any sound system of public finance, that no proposal can be made for the imposition of taxation, for the appropriation of, or affecting or imposing any charge upon, public revenues without the recommendation of the Governor, that is to say, it can only be made on the responsibility of the Executive.³ We understand that, apart from this, legislative procedure in matters of finance differs in India from that which exists in the United Kingdom. There is, for example, no annual Appropriation Act in India, the proposals for the appropriation of revenue being submitted to the Legislature in the form only of Demands for Grants, and a resolution of the Legislature approving a Demand is sufficient legal warrant for the appropriation. No substantial alteration in this system is suggested in the White Paper, and, though we have given some consideration to the matter, we are satisfied that no good reason has been shown for modifying in the new Constitution Act a system with which Indians are familiar and which appears to have worked sufficiently well in practice.

proposals for appropriation of revenue

144 The proposals for the annual appropriation of revenue will according to the White Paper be grouped in three categories¹: (1) those which will not be submitted to the vote of the Legislature, though, (with one exception) they will be open to discussion (2) those which will be so submitted and (3) proposals, if any which the Governor may regard as necessary for the fulfilment of any of his special responsibilities. The importance of those which fall into the first category makes it desirable that we should set them out in full and they are as follows —

(i) Interest, Sinking Fund Charges and other expenditure relating to the raising service and management of loans expenditure fixed by or under the Constitution Act expenditure required to satisfy a decree of any Court or an arbitral award 10

(ii) The salary and allowances of the Governor (these will not be open to discussion) of Ministers and of the Governor's personal or secretarial staff. 15

(iii) The salaries and pensions, including pensions payable to their dependents, the Judges of the High Court or Chief Court or Judicial Commissioners, and expenditure certified by the Governor after consultation with his Ministers, as required for the expenses of those Courts 20

(iv) Expenditure debitable to Provincial revenues required for the discharge of the duties imposed by the Constitution Act on the Secretary of State 25

(v) The salaries and pensions payable to or to the dependents of certain members of the Public Services and certain other sums payable to such persons.

Non-votable heads of expenditure

145. It will be observed that most of these Heads of Expenditure are identical with, or analogous to payments which would in the United Kingdom be described as Consolidated Fund charges and as such would not be voted annually by Parliament. The two principal exceptions are the salaries of Ministers and the salaries and pensions payable to certain members of the Public Services or to their dependents. We think the inclusion of Ministers' salaries is justified. The convention in this country whereby a motion for a nominal reduction in the salary of a Minister has become a convenient method of criticising a Department or ventilating grievances appears not to have established itself in India. On the contrary Legislatures have been known to mis-use their powers in such a way as to deprive Ministers of the whole of their salaries, and have thus rendered it impossible for the Governor to have not only the Ministry of his choice but any Ministry at all a notable example of the way in which the exercise of its powers by a Legislature may by constitutional usage be made to serve a valuable purpose in one country and yet prove wholly destructive in another. We therefore 45 approve the proposal in the White Paper and we are of opinion that ample and no less convenient, opportunities for criticising the Executive will still remain. The non-votable character of salaries and pensions payable to members of the Public Services raises questions of a different kind which we propose to consider later. The separate specification of the proposals regarded by the Governor as necessary for the fulfilment of his special responsibilities calls for no comment.

116 All proposals for appropriation, other than those relating to 10 the heads of expenditure enumerated above, will be submitted to the Legislature in the form of Demands for Grants, and the Legislature will have the right to assent to, or reduce, or to refuse assent to, any Demand including those which the Governor has proposed as necessary for the fulfilment of his special responsibilities 15 Except in the latter case (the Governor being empowered to restore any such Grants, if he thinks it desirable to do so), the decision of the Legislature is final, and it is this power in the matter of supply which will give the Legislature its real control over the Executive. We have already discussed the difficulties which may arise if that power 20 is factiously or irresponsibly exercised, and it is not necessary to repeat what we then said. It has been objected that the Heads of Expenditure which will not be subject to the vote of, but only open to discussion by, the Legislature are so extensive as materially to diminish the field of responsible government in the Province. We 25 are satisfied that there is little, if any, substance in this objection.
 Most of the Heads of Expenditure as we have pointed out, would not, even in the United Kingdom, be the subject of an annual vote by Parliament, and the inclusion of those which do not fall within that category is for reasons which we have given elsewhere clearly 30 justified as a matter of reasonable precaution, if responsible government itself is to be a reality in the future.

System of Demands for Grants.

147 It is proposed that, in those Provinces where the Legislature is bicameral Money Bills shall be initiated in, and Demands for Grants submitted to, the Legislative Assembly alone.² We think that 35 this is right, and that the Legislative Council should not be regarded in any sense as a body having equal powers with the Legislative Assembly, but rather a body with powers of revision and delay, for the purpose of exercising a check upon hasty and ill-considered legislation. Nevertheless, the possibility of a conflict between the 40 two Chambers cannot be disregarded. The method proposed by the White Paper for resolving such a conflict is to give the Governor the power, after a lapse of three months, to summon the two Chambers to meet in a Joint Session for the purpose of reaching a decision on any legislation which has been passed by one Chamber but rejected 45 by the other, the Bill being taken to have been duly passed by both

Chambers if approved by a majority of the members voting at the Joint Session. We do not think that this is a satisfactory solution.
 The period of three months is too short, and would make the powers of the Legislative Council derisory, it ought in our opinion to be one 5 of twelve months at least, except in the case of a Money Bill, the delay of which even for three months might obviously have mischievous consequences. It may be urged that the sessions of the Provincial Legislatures will be comparatively short and that it is never likely in practice that the period of delay will be only three months, but 10 we regard the difference as one of principle. The case of a Bill on which in the Governor's opinion a decision cannot, consistently with the fulfilment of his special responsibilities, be deferred is on a different footing, and we agree that in this case the Governor must himself be empowered to summon forthwith a Joint Session.
 15 It seems to us also that, in view of the relative powers of the two Chambers, a Bill introduced in the Legislative Council but rejected by the Legislative Assembly should lapse, and that the machinery of a Joint Session should be confined to the converse case, and should be put in motion only if the Legislative Assembly so desires. There should be no possibility of further amendment in the Joint Session save for amendments relevant to the points of difference which have arisen between the two Chambers, and the decision of the Presiding Officer who will presumably be the President of the Upper Chamber, on the admissibility of any amendment should be final and conclusive.

The members directly elected will be elected from communal constituencies. The franchise will be based on high property qualifications combined with a qualification based on service in certain distinguished public offices as is proposed in Appendix V Part II, of the White Paper.

The qualifications above indicated will also apply to candidates but special provisions may be necessary in the case of women and the Depressed Classes.

II.—THE FEDERATION

Federation and the Crown

148. We pass now to the proposal in the White Paper to create a new polity in which both the British India Provinces and the Indian States will be federally united. On the principle of the proposal we can entertain no doubts but this will be a Federation of a kind for which so far as we are aware, no historical precedent is to be found. Federations, whether in the past or at the present day, have commonly resulted from the union of independent, or at least autonomous, States, which have agreed to come together for the purpose of creating a new central organism deriving its powers and authority from the surrender by the federating units of a defined part of their own sovereignty or autonomy the powers and authority thus derived being thenceforward exercised by the new organism in the interests and on behalf of the whole body. The Indian States possess sovereignty in varying degrees, but at the present moment the Indian Provinces are not even autonomous for they are subject to both the administrative and legislative control of the Government of India and such authority as they exercise has only the Governor-General in Council. It is therefore the first condition precedent of a federal scheme that these Provinces should be endowed with an autonomy and individuality of their own; but since it is proposed that the Act which brings this about should at the same time create a potential Federation, the new central organism cannot be derived from any formal agreement between the Provinces and the States, but must come into existence by new and hitherto unknown methods. It must be created, with the aid of Parliament, through the instrumentality of the Crown.

30 149 The dominion and authority of the Crown extends over the whole of British India and is exercised subject to the conditions prescribed by the existing Government of India Act. It is derived from many sources, in part statutory and in part prerogative, the former having their origin in Acts of Parliament, and the latter in rights based upon conquest, cession or usage, some of which have been directly acquired, while others are enjoyed by the Crown as successor to the rights of the East India Company. The Secretary of State is the Crown's responsible agent for the exercise of all authority vested in the Crown in relation to the affairs of India, and for the exercise also of certain authority which he derives directly from powers formerly vested in the Court of Directors and the Court of Proprietors of the East India Company, whether with or without the sanction of the body once known as the Board of Control. The superintendence, direction and control of the civil and military Government of India is declared by the Government of India Act to be vested in the Governor-General in Council, and the government or administration of the Governors' and Chief Commissioners' Provinces respectively in the local governments, but powers of superintendence, direction and control over "all acts, operations and concerns which relate to the government or revenue of India" are, subject to substantial relaxation in the transferred provincial field, expressly reserved to the Secretary of State, and whether the Governor-General in Council exercises (though no doubt under the general control of the Secretary of State) original powers of his own, or is only the agent and mouthpiece of the Secretary of State, remains perhaps an open question. It is one which has been the subject of dispute in the past between Secretaries of State and the Governor-General, but the spheres of their respective jurisdictions are now well recognised, and the Secretary of State, though maintaining his powers of control, does not in practice exercise any powers of direct administration, a result to which the increasing authority of the Indian Legislature has no doubt materially contributed.

20 150 It is clear that in any new Constitution in which autonomous Provinces and Indian States are to be federally united under the Crown, not only can the Provinces no longer derive their powers and authority from devolution by the Central Government, but the Central Government cannot continue to be an agent of the Secretary of State. Both must derive their powers and authority from a direct grant by the Crown. We apprehend, therefore, that the legal basis of a reconstituted Government of India must be, first, the resumption into the hands of the Crown of all rights, authority and jurisdiction in and over the territories of British India, whether they are at present vested in the Secretary of State, the Governor-General in Council, or in the provincial Governments and Administrations, and second their redistribution in such manner as the Act may prescribe between the Central Government on the one hand and the Provinces on the other. A Federation of which the British India Provinces are the constituent units will thereby be brought into existence, 35 but since the rights authority and jurisdiction which will be exercised on behalf of the Crown by the Central Government do not extend to any Indian State unless the Ruler has agreed to their exercise for federal purposes in relation to the State, it follows that the accession of an Indian State to the Federation cannot take place otherwise 40 than by the voluntary act of its Ruler. The Constitution Act cannot itself make any Indian State a member of the Federation, it will only prescribe a method whereby the State may accede and the legal consequences which will flow from the accession. There can be no question of compulsion so far as the States are concerned. 45 Their Rulers can enter or stand aside from the Federation as they think fit. They have announced their willingness to consider federation with the Provinces of British India on certain terms but whereas the powers of the new Central Government in relation to the Provinces will cover a wide field and will be identical in the case of each Province the Princes have intimated that they are not prepared to agree to the exercise by a Federal Government for the purpose of the Federation of a similar range of powers in relation to them 5 selves. This is a further aspect of the matter which differentiates the proposed Federation from any other, for not only will some of the constituent units be States whose subjects will continue to owe allegiance to their own Rulers, modified only within the federal sphere but the powers and authority of the Central Government will 10 differ as between one constituent unit and another scheme a practicable

one.

151. The above is in broad outline the scheme adopted in the White Paper,¹ and it seems to us the only method by which such a Federation could be created. We have already said that there are no precedents to which recourse might be had for guidance, though the recent 15 devolution of certain powers of the Spanish Republic, hitherto a completely unitary State in the new autonomous Province of Catalonia perhaps affords a partial and limited analogy but we know of no Federation with constituent units which occupy a position similar to that of any Indian State acceding to the Indian Federation. The 20 latter will be unique in character among the Federations of the world but though for that reason difficulties and complexities are inevitable in the scheme proposed, we regard it as neither unnatural nor impracticable. It will undoubtedly demand for its successful working goodwill on both sides but that is a postulate of every Federation 25 and our enquiry gives us no reason to suppose that good will will be wanting

Rulers' Instruments of Accession

152. It is proposed that the Ruler of a State shall signify to the Crown his willingness to accede to the Federation by executing an Instrument of Accession;² and this Instrument (whatever form it may 30 take) will we assume enable the powers and jurisdiction of the Ruler in respect of those matters which he has agreed to recognise as federal subjects to be exercised by the federal authorities brought into existence by the Constitution Act that is to say the Governor General the Federal Legislature and the Federal Court, but strictly 35 within the limits defined by the Instrument of Accession. Outside these limits the autonomy of the States and their relations with the Crown will not be affected in any way by the Constitution Act. The list of exclusively federal subjects is set out in List I of Appendix VI to the White Paper to which we have already drawn attention 40 and we understand the hope of His Majesty's Government to be that Rulers who accede will in general be willing to accept items I to 48 of List I as federal subjects. We have indicated our view that the Lists in Appendix VI require some modification, a matter 45 with which we deal hereafter, and, therefore, though we speak of items 1 to 48, we do not wish to be understood as necessarily implying that we accept all these items as appropriately falling within the federal sphere, so far as regards the Indian States, or that we think that the definition of some of them is not susceptible of improvement. Subject to this, it is convenient to consider the questions which arise in connection with the Instrument of Accession on the basis of the White Paper proposal, with the explanations which have been given to us on behalf of His Majesty's Government.

153 It would we think be very desirable that the Instruments of Accession should in all cases be in the same form, though we recognise that the list of subjects accepted by the Ruler as federal may not be identical in the case of every State. Questions may arise hereafter whether the Federal Government or the Federal Legislature were competent in relation to a particular State to do certain things or to make certain laws, and the Federal Court may be called upon to pronounce upon them and it would in our opinion be very unfortunate if the Court found itself compelled in any case to base its decision upon some expression or phraseology peculiar to the Instrument under review and not found in other Instruments. Next, we think that the lists of subjects accepted as federal by Rulers willing to accede to the Federation ought to differ from one another as little as possible, and that a Ruler who desires in his own case to except, or to reserve, subjects which appear in what we may perhaps describe as the standard list of federal subjects in relation to the States ought to be invited to justify the exception or reservation, before his accession is accepted by the Crown. We do not doubt that there are States which will be able to make out a good case for the exception or reservation of certain subjects, some by reason of existing treaty rights, others because they have long enjoyed special privileges (as for example in connection with postal arrangements, and even currency or coinage) in matters which will henceforward be the concern of the Federation, but in our judgment it is important that deviations from the standard list should be regarded in all cases as exceptional and not be admitted as of course. We do not need to say that the accession of all States to the Federation will be welcome, but there can be no obligation on the Crown to accept an accession, where the exceptions or reservations sought to be made by the Ruler are such as to make the accession illusory or merely colourable.

154 We regard the States as an essential element in an All-India Federation, but a Federation which comprised the Provinces and only an insignificant number of the States would scarcely be deserving of the name. This is recognised in the White Paper, where it is proposed that the Federation shall be brought into existence by the issue of a Proclamation by His Majesty, but that no such Proclamation shall be issued until the Rulers of States representing not less than half the aggregate population of the States and entitled to not less than half the seats to be allotted to the States in the Instruments should, so far as possible, follow a standard form

Accession of sufficient number of States, a condition precedent to Federation.

The constitutionally anomalous position which would arise in regard to Defence if the present arrangements were allowed to continue under the new constitution would be particularly marked. We are moreover inclined to see some force in the argument that it is desirable on general grounds given the importance of Aden from a strategic standpoint to the Empire in the East as a whole, and not merely to any individual unit, that its control should vest in the Home Government. After full consideration we are of opinion that the administration of the Settlement of Aden should be transferred from the Government of India to His Majesty's Government not later than the date of the establishment of Federation. In reaching this conclusion we have not ignored the apprehensions expressed by Indian interests connected with Aden as to the possible prejudicial effect of a transfer upon their position. We have however ascertained that His Majesty's Government are prepared in the event of transfer not merely to relieve India of her annual financial contribution but to preserve a right of appeal in judicial cases to the Bombay High Court to maintain (in the absence of any radical change in present economic circumstances) the existing policy of making Aden a free port to leave nothing undone to keep the administration at its present standard and to impose no additional taxation unless in their opinion such a course is quite inevitable. They are further prepared to agree that a proportion of Indian Service personnel shall be retained for some years after the date of transfer that no racial discrimination shall be permitted and that British Indian subjects shall be allowed to enter the Protectorate under precisely the same conditions as any other British subjects. These assurances ought, in our view adequately to meet the apprehensions to which we have referred above.

III—RESPONSIBILITY AT THE CENTRE

The Federal Centre.

160 We come lastly to the proposals in the White Paper which relate to the Federal Government and Legislature. Much that we have said in connection with the Provinces applies equally to the Centre, but there are special problems connected with the latter for which there neither is nor can be any provincial counterpart. The Federal Government will be the point of contact between the Provinces and the Indian States which accede to the Federation: it will be the connecting link between all the constituent units as such, and there must exist at the Centre a residuary and ultimate responsibility for the peace and tranquillity of the whole of India. The authority and functions of the Governor General as the representative of the Crown assume in all these spheres a particular importance, especially in relation to Defence and External Affairs and in connexion with the latter subjects the problems associated with a dynarchical system have to be examined. We propose to consider first, the Federal Executive and the Federal Legislature and the relations between the two and, secondly the relations between the Federation and its constituent units, that is, the Provinces and those Indian States which have become members of the Federation.

(1) THE FEDERAL EXECUTIVE

The present
Executive
in India

161 The present executive authority in India both in civil and in military matters, is the Governor General in Council. The members of the Governor General's Executive Council of whom not less than three must be persons who have been for at least ten years in the

be appointed by the Crown, and then for a term of five years, though there is a Commander-in-Chief is ordinarily, though not a member of the Council, and in that case has rank of Governor-General himself. The present Council is (of whom three are Indians), in addition to the Commander-in-Chief. The decisions of his Council, and the decision of the Council, prevail, though the Governor-General has the right of an equality of votes, and the right which in his judgment affects the good of British India, or any part thereof, the members of the Council who are representatives of the Crown in India are invariably in the Civil Service, the post of Law Member is filled by an Indian lawyer, and that of the Secretary is filled by a person with financial experience from the Civil Service.

r, Proposals 6—55

not qualified for election as a member of the Legislative Assembly, and if any non-official holds office under the Crown in India, he may be a member of the Governor-General's Council, or a member of one of the Chambers and Commissions, or a member of the other, though he cannot exercise the Executive Government is not responsible to the Secretary of State and thus the Governor-General in Council, if satisfied that a person has been refused by the Legislative Assembly of his responsibilities, can act notwithstanding the refusal of the Legislative Assembly. The Governor-General also has power in case of emergency to suspend any law which may in his opinion be necessary for the good of British India, or any part thereof. These powers of the Executive, though they may exercise an influence upon policy in a that, as in the case of the Governor-General, the Executive power and authority of the Federation shall as the representative of the King¹ be derived from the Constitution Act and the Governor-General will also exercise such prerogative powers inconsistent with the Act) as to delegate to him. The former is to be of the military, naval and air forces and the power should be reserved to His Highness the Commander-in-Chief to exercise in relation to the military, naval and air forces as may be assigned to him. The Governor-General, as a member of the Federation the executive power in such matters as the Ruler has reserved to himself in the federal sphere by his Instrument of Accession, that there shall be a Council of Advisers appointed by the Governor-General and the Ruler, to aid and advise him in the discharge of his duties as provided on him by the Constitution Act and the Ruler. (1) defence, external affairs and the administration of British Baluchistan,

Governor-General will always endeavour to secure the appointment of a person acceptable to his Ministers for since we may assume that he will be a person selected not only by reason of his financial qualifications but also for his tact and commonsense the value of his services would in our judgment be no less diminished if he held himself aloof from Ministers than if he sought to interfere in matters outside his proper functions. We think that such an adviser, if the right selection is made may prove of the greatest assistance both to the Governor-General and to Ministers, and that the more successful he is in the performance of the duties attaching to his office the less likelihood will there be of exercise by the Governor-General of any of his special powers.

168. We have nothing to add to what we have already said with regard to the special responsibilities specified under (c) (d) and (e). As regards (f) the protection of the rights of any Indian State, we have already expressed the view that this special responsibility only applies where there is a conflict between rights arising under the Constitution Act and those enjoyed by a State outside the federal sphere. It may be necessary for the Governor-General to deal with such a conflict not only in his capacity as the executive head of the Federation but also in his capacity as the representative of the Crown in its relations with the States but his special responsibility must necessarily arise in the first capacity only. The responsibility specified in (g) calls for no comment since it is plain that the Governor-General must be free to exercise his own judgment in any matter which affects the administration of any of the reserved departments even though it arises primarily within the ministerial sphere.

(11) The Governor-General's Selection of Ministers

169 [As in the case of the Provinces, it is proposed that federal Ministers must be or become within a stated period, members of one or other Chamber of the Legislature.¹ We have expressed the opinion that the Governor of a Province ought not to be thus restricted in his choice of Ministers, and we think that in principle the choice of the Governor-General ought similarly to be unrestricted. The reasons which led us to the above conclusion in regard to the Provinces do not however apply with the same force, and we have no doubt that it would be very rarely if at all, that the Governor-General would find it necessary or desirable to appoint Ministers who are not members of the Legislature or unlikely to become members within the prescribed period. Since also it is proposed that there shall be a small element nominated by the Governor-General in the Upper Chamber of the Legislature the question is even less likely to arise in practice but we think nevertheless that no distinction should be made in this particular respect between the Federation and the Provinces.]

(12) The Reserved Departments

170. The White Paper proposes that the Governor-General shall himself direct and control the administration of the Departments of Defence, External Affairs and Ecclesiastical Affairs¹ these matters will therefore remain outside the ministerial sphere and the Governor-General's responsibility with respect to them will be to the Secretary of State and thus ultimately to Parliament. The Governor-General could not it is plain undertake in person so great an administrative burden, and it is therefore proposed that he should be assisted by not more than three Counsellors who will be appointed by him and whose salaries and conditions of service will be prescribed by order in Council.² Since also it is necessary that the Governor-General should have a spokesman in the Legislature on matters connected with the Reserved Departments, each Counsellor will be ex-officio an additional member of both Chambers of the Legislature for all purposes, though without the right to vote, and we assume that there will be no restriction on his right to take part in any of the debates in the Legislature if he desires to do so.

Defence

171 The Department of Defence is a cardinal Department, for it is responsible for the defence of India in all its aspects, whether concerned with internal security or with protection from foreign invasion. The sober and impressive chapter on the Army in India which forms part of the Statutory Commission's survey makes it unnecessary for us to discuss in any detail the difficulties and complexities of this vital subject in its relation to India, and we do not desire either to add to or qualify their presentation of the problem.³ Their investigation led them indeed to a conclusion which differs, in its constitutional aspect, from our own, but on the facts of the matter we find ourselves in complete agreement with them.

The Statutory Commission on the Army in India.

¹ White Paper, Proposal 11. It is also proposed that the Governor-General shall himself direct and control the administration of British Baluchistan (White Paper, Proposal 5), but there will not be a Reserved Department of British Baluchistan, which will be a Chief Commissioner's Province and will be in no different position from other Chief Commissioner's Provinces, except that Ministers will not advise the Governor-General in relation to its administration.

172 The Commission, convinced that dyarchy in the Central Government was wholly inadmissible inquired whether any other plan was feasible which would provide adequately for the needs of Indian defence and offer at the same time an earlier prospect for further constitutional advance, and they suggested as the only possible answer that the protection of the Indian frontiers should not, at any rate for a long time to come, be regarded as a function of an Indian Government in relation with an Indian Legislature, but as a responsibility to be assumed by the Imperial Government.¹ This plan has not, we think, found advocates even among those who would be prepared to assent generally to the recommendation of the Commission, and it seems to us to avoid the difficulties of one kind of dyarchy by creating what is in substance, if not in form, another We are unwilling for reasons which we have already given that the problem of defence should for ever bar the way to any form of responsibility at the Centre, and we are prepared to accept the risks which we recognise to be implicit in a dyarchical system, but it is an essential condition of the experiment that in the sphere of defence the Governor-General's responsibility should remain undivided and unimpaired and that the Department of Defence should be under his exclusive direction and control. It should be remembered also that it is through this agency that the obligation will be discharged which the Crown has assumed for the protection, whether externally or internally, of the States. Responsible British-India opinion does not deny the necessity for the reservation, though the

The Commission's recommendation.

Joint Memorandum of the British India Delegations seeks to add certain qualifications, to which we shall refer later and we proceed therefore to a consideration of some of the more important questions which it involves

Relations

of Defence and other Departments.

173. No department of Government can be completely self 30 contained, and a Department of Defence is no exception to the rule. Its administration does not indeed normally impinge upon the work of other Departments, save in time of war or other grave emergency but its policy and plans may be greatly influenced by theirs, and by the knowledge that it is able to rely upon their co-operation at 35 moments of crisis. It is vital, therefore that where defence policy is concerned the Department should be able to secure that its views prevail in the event of a difference of opinion. The special responsibility which it is proposed that the Governor General shall have in respect of any matter affecting the administration of the Departments 40 under his direct control will enable him in the last resort to secure that action is not taken in the ministerial sphere which might conflict with defence policy and he will also be able to avail himself of the power which the Federal Government will possess to give directions as to the manner in which the executive authority in the 45 Provinces is to be exercised in relation to any matter affecting the administration of a federal subject, since Defence is none the less a federal subject because reserved. Thus the maintenance of commun- 5 cations, especially on mobilisation is a vital military necessity, and the Governor General must have power in case of need to issue directions to the Railway Authority or to require the Minister in charge of communications, to take such action as the Governor 5 General may deem advisable. In the provincial sphere questions may arise with regard to the control of lands, buildings or equipment maintained or required by the Department, or with regard to such matters as facilities for manoeuvres or the efficiency and well being of defence personnel stationed in provincial areas. In all matters of 10 this kind where there is a difference of opinion with other authorities, the final responsibility for a decision, if defence policy is concerned, must rest with the Governor General and his views must prevail.

Co-opera-

174. It may be assumed that in practice the willing co-operation 15 of the other departments of Government—Federal or Provincial—will render unnecessary any recourse to these special powers and we should view with dismay the prospects of any new Constitution, if the relations between the ministerial and the reserved Departments were conducted in an atmosphere of jealousy or antagonism. The influence of the Governor General will no doubt always be exerted 20 to secure co-ordination and harmony but it may well be that some permanent co-ordinating machinery will be desirable. The British India Joint Memorandum suggests a statutory Committee of Indian Defence which in other respects would be modelled on the Committee of Imperial Defence but we are not sure that its authors fully 25 appreciate the position and functions of the latter since it is not a statutory body and its value is perhaps increased by that very fact. We are disposed to think that a body with statutory powers and duties might embarrass the Governor General and even be tempted to encroach upon his functions. A consultative body established at the 30 Governor General's discretion would not be open to that criticism and might, we think have many advantages.

175 The Joint Memorandum observes that, since the Governor-General in Council exercises superintendence, direction and control over the military as well as the civil government in India, the reservation of the Department of Defence to the Governor-General will have the effect of depriving Ministers of the influence over Army policy which at the present time Indian Members of the Governor-General's Council are able to exert. It urges therefore (1) that the Governor-General's Counsellor in charge of the Department of Defence should always be a non-official Indian, and preferably an elected member of the Legislature or a representative of one of the States, (2) that the control now exercised by the Finance Member and the Finance Department should be continued, and (3) that all questions relating to army policy and the annual army budget should be considered by the entire Ministry, including both Ministers and Counsellors, though it is admitted that in cases of difference the decision of the Governor-General must prevail. As to the first point

Suggestions
of British-
India Delegation.

we do not think that the Governor-General's choice ought to be fettered in any way, and he must be free to select the man best fitted in his opinion for the post. As to the second, we understand that the Military Finance and the Military Accounts Departments are at the present time subordinate to the Finance Department of the Government of India, and not to the Army Department. It seems to us a necessary corollary of the reservation of defence that both of them should be brought under the Department of Defence, since the responsibility for the expenditure which they supervise can only be that of the Governor-General. But the transfer would not preclude an arrangement whereby the Federal Department of Finance is kept in close touch with the work of both these branches and we do not doubt that some such arrangement ought to be made. As to the third point, we observe a proposal in the White Paper that the Governor-General's Instrument of Instructions should direct him to consult the Federal Ministers before the army budget is laid before the Legislature,¹ and so long as nothing is done to blur the responsibility of the Governor-General it seems to us not only desirable in principle, but inevitable in practice, that the Federal Ministry, and in particular, the Finance Minister, should be brought into consultation before the proposals for defence expenditure are finally settled.

176 We pass to the vexed question of Indianization. The Governor-General's Instrument of Instructions will, we understand, formally recognise the fact that the defence of India must to an increasing extent be the concern of the Indian people, and not of the United Kingdom alone.² With this general proposition we are in entire agreement, and we have every sympathy with what the Statutory Commission rightly call the natural and legitimate aspirations of India. But Indianization is a problem which admits of no facile solution, and least of all one based upon the automatic application of a time-table, and if we should seem to emphasize its difficulties, it is because we are anxious that Indian political leaders should be realists in this matter, and not because it is either our desire or our intention to derogate from or to evade the pledges which have been given by successive Governments in this country.

The Indianization

177 It is sometimes said that so long as the officer ranks of the Indian Army are not fully Indianized complete self-government must be indefinitely deferred. We do not regard that view as self-evident, and indeed the problem of Indianization does not appear to us to be essentially related to the constitutional issues with which we are concerned. Since however it has been brought before us we think it wise to repeat the conclusions of the Statutory Commission that the issues involved are too vital, and the practical difficulties too great to justify a precipitate embarkation on a wholesale process of substituting Indian for British personnel in the Indian Army." 45

White Paper Introd. para. 23.

A further difficulty arises from the difference (in a military sense) between the martial and the other races of India. We are well aware that this difference is alleged to have no existence in fact or at least to have been exaggerated for political purposes but no unprejudiced person can deny that it is there, and that it is beyond the power of Parliament to alter it. There are some things which even an Act of Parliament cannot do. It is subdued to what it works in and spiritual values are beyond its scope and something more than a section in a statute is required to eliminate racial differences or to breathe life into the elements which go to the making of a national army. Parliament can provide the conditions in which the creation of a homogeneous Indian nation may become possible but the act of creation must be the work of Indian hands.

 development of Indianiza-
 tion

178. We think it right to mention these things because of the suggestion put forward in the British India Joint Memorandum that there should be a definite programme of Indianization with reference to a time limit of 20 or 25 years and that one of the primary duties of an Indian Army Counsellor should be the provision and training of Indian officers for the programme of Indianization. It is in our judgment impossible to include in the Constitution Act or in any other statute a provision for the complete Indianization of the Army within a specified period of time. The scheme introduced in 1931 provides for the Indianization of the equivalent of one Cavalry Brigade and one Infantry Division complete with all arms and ancillary services and we are assured that it has been initiated by the military authorities in India with the fullest sense of their responsibility in the matter and that further developments will depend upon the success of the experiment. If the experiment succeeds the process will be extended and developed and Indians can rely on all the sympathy and assistance which we are able to give them for the purpose of creating an army of their own. We endorse the measured words of the Statutory Commission. Neither British politician or Indian politician can wisely decide such matters without special knowledge and expert advice. We are only concerned here to convey a double warning—a warning on the one hand that Britain cannot indefinitely treat the present military organization of India as sacrosanct and unalterable but must make an active endeavour to search for such adjustments as might be possible and a warning on the other hand that Indian statesmen can help to modify the existing arrangement in the direction of self government only if they too will co-operate by facing the hard facts and by remembering that those who set them out for further consideration are not gloating over obstacles, but are offering the help of friends to Indian aspirations." 1

179. It will be more convenient to consider certain questions which have been raised in connection with the rights of Defence personnel in that part of our Report in which we deal with the rights of the Services generally. The question of the future recruitment for the Indian Medical Service, which has an important military bearing, is discussed in the same place, and it is unnecessary therefore to do more than mention it here.

7. 180 The White Paper proposals have been thought to contemplate the possible abolition of the office of Commander in Chief in India. We do not so read them and we are assured that no such intention is in the mind of His Majesty's Government. The

External Affairs

- 10 181 The Department of External Affairs is in our opinion rightly reserved to the Governor-General, if only because of the intimate External affairs connection between foreign policy and defence. At the present time the Foreign Department, of which the Governor-General himself holds the portfolio, is only concerned with the relations between the 15 Government of India on the one hand and foreign countries on the other, and not with the relations between the Government of India and the Dominions, and we are informed that the expression "External Affairs" is not intended to include the latter, a decision with which we concur. It was urged before us that the making
20 of commercial or trade agreements with foreign countries was essentially a matter for which the future Minister for Commerce should be responsible rather than the Governor-General. In the United Kingdom, however, all agreements with foreign countries are made through the Foreign Office. Any other arrangement 25 would lead to grave inconvenience, but when a trade or commercial agreement is negotiated, the Foreign Office consult and co-operate with the Board of Trade, whose officials necessarily take part in any discussions which precede the agreement. We assume that similar arrangements will be adopted in India, and that the 30 Department of External Affairs will maintain a close contact with the Department of Trade or Commerce, but we are clear that agreements of any kind with a foreign country must be made by the Governor-General, even if on the merits of a trade or commercial issue he is guided by the advice of the appropriate Minister.

Ecclesiastical Affairs

- 182 The origin of the Ecclesiastical Department is to be found in the obligation imposed by the Charters of the East India Company to provide chaplains on their ships and at their stations, and since Ecclesiastical affairs 1858, when the rights and obligations of the East India Company 40 finally passed to the Crown, the Government of India have rightly regarded it as their duty to provide for the spiritual needs of British troops stationed in India and, so far as circumstances admit, of the European members of the Civil Services. The Secretary of State in Council has under his general powers established and maintained 45 for this purpose a cadre of official chaplains appointed by himself and has authorised grants-in-aid out of Indian revenues for the maintenance of churches and of a certain number of non-official chaplains, the present annual expenditure of the Department being approximately 40 lakhs. Since the Indian Church Act, 1927, and the Indian Church often proved a valuable aid to constitutional development, but a fiction whereby the form but not the substance is altered can serve no useful purpose. We hope nevertheless that the Counsellors, even if they cannot share the responsibility of Ministers, will be freely admitted to their deliberations. It would indeed be difficult, if not impossible, to conduct the administration of the Department of Defence in complete aloofness from other departments of government, and the maintenance of close and friendly relations with Departments under the control of Ministers can only increase its efficiency. We understand the intention of His Majesty's Government to be that the principle of joint deliberation shall be recognised and encouraged by the Governor-General's Instrument of Instructions. We warmly approve the principle, and we think that it will prove a valuable addition to the machinery of government without derogating in any way from the personal responsibility of the Governor-General for the administration of the Reserved Departments.

185 We recognise the difficulty which necessarily attaches to a dyarchical system, and that for its successful working, tact and sympathy of no common order will be required on both sides. The White Paper states that the proposals which it contains "proceed on the basic assumption that every endeavour will be made by those responsible for working the Constitution to approach the administrative problems which will present themselves in the spirit of partners in a common enterprise".¹ If this assumption proves, as we hope, to be well-founded, many difficulties will disappear. Some at least of them appear to arise from a misunderstanding of the White Paper. Thus we were informed that, though the normal number of the Governor-General's Counsellors would probably be two, it was thought advisable to take power to appoint a third in case of need, but according to the Joint Memorandum of the British-India Delegation, fears have been expressed in India that, if a third Counsellor is appointed and "is placed in charge of the special responsibilities of the Governor-General," he may develop into what is described as "a super-Minister, whose activities must necessarily take the form of interference with the work of the responsible Ministers." It is impossible to forecast with any accuracy the volume of work involved in the Governor-General's administrative responsibilities, and it may well be that the appointment of a third Counsellor will be found necessary but, if we may respectfully say so, the notion that there is a danger of his becoming a "super-Minister" seems to us altogether fantastic. To speak of a Counsellor being "placed in charge of the special responsibilities of the Governor-General" is wholly to misapprehend the conception of the special responsibilities embodied in the White Paper, which do not set apart a governmental or departmental sphere of action from which Ministers are excluded, or even one in which the Governor-General has concurrent powers with his Ministers. We do not, as we have said elsewhere, anticipate that the occasions on which the Governor-General or a Governor will find himself compelled in the discharge of his special responsibilities to dissent from ministerial advice tendered to him are likely to be numerous, and the Governor-General and his Counsellors even if the latter had the power, will not have such ample leisure at their disposal as to be tempted to utilise it for the purpose of interfering with the day to day administration business of Ministers.

The Governor General's
staff

186. The Governor-General even more than the provincial Governors, will require an adequate staff with an officer of high standing at its head. Whether one of the Counsellors will fill this position it is unnecessary for us to consider for the question is administrative rather than constitutional but it is of exceptional importance that the Governor-General should be well served and we do not doubt that this matter has engaged and will continue to engage the earnest attention of His Majesty's Government.

(v) The Governor-General's Special Powers

powers

187. The special powers legislative and financial of the Governor-General as described in the White Paper do not differ (mutatis mutandis) from those which it is proposed to give to the Governor of a Province. It is therefore sufficient to refer to what we have already said upon the subject in an earlier part of this Report, and we have nothing to add to it here.

(2) RELATIONS BETWEEN THE FEDERAL EXECUTIVE AND LEGISLATURE

Difficulties created by composite nature of Executive
and Legislature

188. We have considered in an earlier part of our Report the problem of the relations between the Executive and the Legislature of a Province, and when we examine the relations between the Federal Executive and Legislature, it is plain that many of the same questions arise. But a further complication is introduced into the Federal Executive for it is proposed that the Governor-General should in selecting the Ministers who are likely to command the confidence of the Legislature, include so far as possible not only members of important minority communities but also representatives of the States which accede to the Federation¹. We have already stated our opinion that the acceptance of this principle, inevitable though we recognise it to be, is likely to retard the growth of political parties in the true sense, and it is perhaps even more likely to do so at the Centre than in the Provinces, since we can scarcely doubt that State representation will always be regarded by the States themselves as a necessary and essential element in every administration. The Federal Legislature, though intended to be representative of India as a whole will itself be largely based upon a system of communal representation and in these circumstances we do not overlook the possibility that in place of an Executive which propounds, and a Legislature which deliberates upon a national policy, there may be found two bodies each tending to become in a classic phrase, a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests which interests each must maintain as an advocate and agent against other agents and advocates.

189. The proposed dyarchical character of the Government augments or at least does not diminish the complexities of the situation. It is unnecessary to repeat all that the Statutory Commission have said on the working of dyarchy in the Provinces but we may usefully quote one passage from their Report. "The practical difficulty in the way of achieving the objective of dyarchy and of obtaining a clear demarcation of responsibility arises not so much in the inner councils of government as in the eyes of the Legislature the electorate and the public. Provincial Legislatures were by the nature of the Constitution set the difficult task of discharging two different functions at the same time. In the one sphere they were to exercise control over policy in the other while free to criticise and vote or withhold supply they were to have no responsibility

question.

191. Of the difficulties presented by the system of dyarchy we desire to speak frankly. We do not doubt that in what the Statutory Commission call the inner councils of government they can readily be solved and the moderating and unifying influence which the Governor-General both as the head of the Executive and as representative in India of the Crown, will be in a position to exercise.

must always be a powerful factor. But the task of discharging two different functions at the same time may prove no less difficult for the Federal than it has been for a Provincial Legislature and a great responsibility will rest upon the Federal Legislature if the scheme is to prove workable in practice without (as we hope) the intervention of the Governor-General or recourse to any of his special powers. In the reserved sphere the Legislature will have the power to criticize, but not to thwart the Executive to influence, but not to determine, policy and since in this sphere Defence is infinitely the most important subject the crucial question is whether the Legislature will be prepared where Defence is concerned to adopt a responsible and not an irresponsible attitude. We cannot deny that it may be tempted (in the phrase of the Statutory Commission) 'to magnify its functions in the reserved field. The military budget and the progress of Indianisation are matters on which strong views are held and it is not to be supposed that under a dyarchical system they will cease to be of interest to legislators. But it is upon the clear demarcation of responsibility that the White Paper scheme depends, and we must state as emphatically as we can that its maintenance is one of the essential conditions of responsible government at the Centre.

Influence of the Indian States

192. It will be said that the practical working of dyarchy in the Provinces as it has been depicted by the Statutory Commission is scarcely a recommendation for its introduction at the Centre, and that the Governor-Generals' Counsellors in any conflict with the Legislature may find themselves in a difficult position without the support of an official bloc. We do not dispute the force of this argument but we have given reasons elsewhere for holding that the administrative difficulties of dyarchy at the Centre are not comparable with those which it has presented in the Provinces where the inter relation of the two branches of the government makes it impossible in practice to divide the administration of provincial business into mutually exclusive compartments. The same District Officer may for example have to give effect to directions from a Minister and an Executive Councillor each in his own sphere but the Governor-General's Reserved Departments are administratively separate and self-contained and we are satisfied that the practical difficulties which have been experienced in the Provinces are far less likely to arise. Secondly we repeat that our recommendation in favour of responsibility at the Centre is conditional on the accession to the Federation of the Indian States. In all matters relating to Defence their interest is a powerful and reassuring factor. Dyarchy could not for many years to come be an adequate solution of the problem of defence with an exclusively British India Centre. With the accession of the Indian States it becomes at once an all India problem and the presence in the Federal Legislature of representatives of the States will afford a guarantee if any be required that these grave matters will be weighed and considered with a full appreciation of the issues at stake.

193 We draw attention in conclusion to an argument which has been frequently urged, that the grant of responsible government at the Centre is likely to be prejudicial to the interests of the masses of India. We are unable to appreciate the force of this argument when it is used, as it commonly is, by those who are willing to concede responsible government to an autonomous Province. A cursory glance at the list of subjects which comprise the exclusively provincial field will show that the activities of government which most closely affect the interests of the masses fall within the provincial sphere. It is true that there are also subjects in the federal field which might touch those interests. Some of these relate to social matters in which, for reasons which we have already given, measures of reform seem to us beyond the power of any but a responsible Indian Government to undertake. Of the others, tariffs are perhaps the most important, but in our opinion it may well prove that the interests of the consumer will be more fully weighed and safeguarded than they have sometimes been in the past by a Legislature in which agricultural interests will be strongly reinforced by the representatives of the Indian States.

20 (3) THE FEDERAL LEGISLATURE

Composition of, and election to, the Legislature

194 There is no part of the subject of our enquiry which has seemed to us to present greater difficulties than the question of the method of election to a Central Legislature for India. It is one on which there has always been a marked difference of opinion, and we recall that the Joint Select Committee which considered the Government of India Bill in 1919 did not accept the recommendations of the Southborough Committee which had been embodied in the Bill, and that there is a similar divergence between the recommendations of the Statutory Commission and the proposals in the White Paper. In these circumstances our task has been an anxious one, and we have only arrived at our conclusions after a careful and prolonged examination of the matter in all its aspects.

195 The White Paper proposes that the Federal Legislature shall consist of the King, represented by the Governor-General, and two Chambers, to be styled the Council of State and the House of Assembly. The Council of State is to consist of not more than 260 members, of whom 150 will be representatives of British India, not more than 100 will be appointed by the Rulers of States who accede to the Federation, and not more than 10 will be nominated by the Governor-General in his discretion. The Governor-General's Counsellors, who will be ex-officio members of both Chambers for all purposes except the right of voting, are not included in the above figures, and it is provided that the members to be nominated by the Governor-General shall not be officials. The House of Assembly will consist of not more than 375 members, of whom 250

will be representatives of British India, and not more than 125 will be appointed by the Rulers of States who have acceded to the Federation.¹

196 The representatives of British India in the Council of State will to the number of 136 be elected by the members of the Provincial Legislatures, by the method of the single transferable vote. Indian, Christian, Anglo-Indian and European members of the Provincial Legislatures will not be entitled to vote for these representatives, but 10 non provincial communal seats will be reserved for them ("for Europeans, 2 for Indian Christians and one for Anglo-Indians), 10 these seats being filled by three electoral colleges, consisting respectively of the European, Indian Christian and Anglo-Indian members of the Provincial Legislatures, and voting for the European and Indian Christian seats being by the method of the single transferable vote. Coorg Ajmer Delhi and Baluchistan will each have one 15 representative. Members of the Coorg Legislature will elect to the Coorg seat, but special provision is to be made in the case of the other three.²

election to the House of Assembly

197 The representatives of British India in the House of Assembly will be elected by direct election in provincial constituencies, except 20 in the case of three of the seats reserved for Commerce and Industry and one of the labour seats, where the constituencies will be non provincial. Election to the seats, allotted to the Muhammadan Sikh, Indian Christian, Anglo-Indian and European constituencies will be by voters voting in separate communal electorates and all 25 qualified voters who are not voters in one of these constituencies will be entitled to vote in a general constituency. Election to the seats reserved for the Depressed Classes out of the general seats, will be in accordance with the arrangements embodied in the Poona Pact, which we have described elsewhere. Election to the woman's 30 seat in each of the Provinces to which such a seat is allocated will be by members of the Provincial Legislature voting by the method of single transferable vote. The special seats assigned to Commerce and Industry will be filled by election by Chambers of Commerce and other similar associations and the special seats assigned to 35 landowners will be filled by election in special landholders' constituencies.³

The precedent of other Federations

198. The proposals in the White Paper thus follow other Federal Constitutions in adopting direct election for the Lower House. We are then confronted with the question whether in spite of precedents, such 40 a system is appropriate in the case of so vast a country as India, and whether circumstances do not require the substitution of some method of indirect election and, if so, what that method ought to be.

Direct or

199 Direct election has the support of Indian opinion and is strongly advocated by the British India Delegation in their Joint Memorandum. It has been the system in India for the last twelve years and has worked on the whole reasonably well though it should be remembered with a much more limited franchise than that now 5 proposed. The Southborough Committee which visited India in 1919 for the purpose of settling the composition of and the method of election to the Legislatures set up by the Government of India Bill of that year did it is true recommend the indirect system but the Joint Select Committee which examined the Bill 10 were of a contrary view, and Parliament accepted the opinion of the Committee. It may also be argued that, with the increase in the size of the Legislatures now proposed it will be possible to effect so appreciable a reduction in the size of the existing constituencies as to diminish the objections based on that feature of the present 15 system. But even the reduction in the size of constituencies which would follow from the White Paper proposals will still leave them unwieldy and unmanageable unless the number of seats is increased beyond all reasonable limits. Where a single constituency may be greater in extent than the whole of Wales, a candidate for election could not in any event commend or even present his views to the whole body of electors, even if the means of communication were not, as in India, difficult and often non-existent, and quite apart from obstacles presented by differences in language and a widespread illiteracy. nor could a member after election hope to guide or inform opinion in his constituency. These difficulties would be serious enough with the comparatively limited franchise proposed in the White Paper but future extensions of that franchise would be inevitable, and it is obvious that with every increase in the electorate these difficulties are enhanced.

200 A close and intimate contact between a representative and his constituency is of the essence of representative government, so that the former may be conscious of a genuine responsibility to those whom he represents, and the latter that they are able to influence his actions and in case of need call him to account. The relationship has been described in a passage familiar to all "It ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents, their wishes ought to have great weight with him, their opinion high respect, and their business his unremitting attention", but we confess that we can recognize no likeness to this description in any relations which could exist between a member of the Central Legislature in India and the vast constituencies which he would represent under a system of direct election.

201 We realise the strength of Indian opinion in this matter, and we are far from denying that the present system has produced legislators of high quality, but we are now recommending to Parliament the establishment of self-government in India and we regard it as fundamental that the system of election to the Central Legislature should be such as to make the responsibility of a member to those who elect him a real and effective responsibility. We do not think that this can be secured under a system of direct election proposed in the White Paper, and, though we are conscious that we are reversing the decision made by Parliament in 1919, we have come to the conclusion, notwithstanding the theoretical objections which can be urged against it, that there is no alternative to the adoption, of some form of indirect election.

202 We have examined many systems of indirect election. Systems based upon electoral groups at first sight have many attractions, but we have felt bound to reject them for reasons similar to those which we have already given in that part of our Report which deals with the provincial franchise.¹ We have also considered election by municipal and other local bodies, which was a prominent feature of the Morley-Minto Constitution, but we are satisfied that the system did not work well, and that there is no justification for an attempt to revive it. We have come to the conclusion that the Provincial Assemblies form the only possible electoral colleges, and we recommend accordingly that the Federal House of Assembly should be, in the main, elected by members of those bodies. We should have been glad if it had been possible to provide for election by the method of single transferable vote, since this would have avoided the necessity of reproducing at the Centre the system of a communal distribution of seats. We however found ourselves unable to recommend this, firstly, because the special interests such as commerce industry landlords and labour would not obtain adequate representation and secondly because, though the single transferable vote would in all probability make it possible for the communities to obtain substantially the same representation 30 as under the White Paper proposal, the minority communities would regard it with suspicion and we think it essential that nothing should be done which would afford opportunities for re-opening the communal question. We accordingly recommend that the Hindu Muhammadan, and Sikh seats should be filled 35 by the representatives of those communities in the Provincial Assemblies voting separately for a prescribed number of communal seats and that within the Hindu group special arrangements should be made for the Depressed Classes. With regard to the Indian Christians and Europeans, their representation in the 40 Provincial Assemblies is so small that this plan would not be suitable, and we think, therefore, that it will be necessary that they should vote in an electoral college formed by their representatives in all the Provincial Assemblies.

The Council of State

203. The White Paper proposes that the members of the Council of 48 State should be elected by the members of the Provincial Legislatures, including members of the Provincial Upper Chambers where the Legislature is bicameral. The method of election proposed is that of the single transferable vote a communal distribution of seats being thereby avoided but special arrangements are contemplated for Europeans, Anglo-Indians and Indian Christians, which would not otherwise be in a position to secure adequate representation. 5 No provision is made for representation in the Council of State of special interests. We accept these proposals in principle but if as we recommend, the Provincial Assemblies are to elect to the Federal House Assembly it will clearly be necessary to find different electoral colleges for the Council of State. It seems to us that the only alter 10 native electoral college is the Provincial Legislative Council in those Provinces where a Legislative Council exists and in the unicameral Provinces we recommend that an ad hoc electoral college should be constituted of persons elected by an electorate broadly corresponding to the electorate for the Legislative Councils in bicameral Provinces, 15 the communal distribution of seats in this electoral college corresponding to that in the Provincial Assemblies.

Sept 1934 122.

Council of State should be constituted on more permanent basis.

204. The White Paper proposes that each Council of State shall continue for seven years and each Federal House of Assembly for five years, power being reserved to the Governor-General in his discretion 20 to dissolve both Houses either separately or simultaneously. We prefer a Council of State constituted on a more permanent basis, and accordingly recommend that it should not be subject to dissolution, that its members should be elected for a period of nine years, and that one-third should retire and be replaced at the end of every third 25 year (special arrangements would in that event be required for the first nine-year period following on its first constitution).

* Size of the two Federal Houses.

205. The numbers proposed in the White Paper for the two Federal Houses have been the subject of criticism, and we see many advantages in Houses of a smaller size especially in view of the 30 proposals to which we refer hereafter for Joint Sessions of both Houses. We are however convinced after a careful examination of the whole question that the balance of convenience is against any reduction of the numbers proposed in the White Paper. In the 35 first place, the size of the Houses will regulate the number of seats available for the representation of the Princes, and unless this representation is generally acceptable to the Princes, as a whole, they may be unwilling to federate and the first condition precedent to the establishment of the Federation would not be fulfilled.

 40 Certain of the larger States have, it is true, expressed a preference for substantially smaller Houses, but we are satisfied that the general body of States would be unwilling to accept any arrangement which assigned to the States less than 100 seats in the Federal Upper House. There is general agreement that the States should 45 have a 50 per cent representation in the House, which implies a House of about 250 members, as the White Paper proposes. For reasons which we discuss in connexion with the relative powers of the two Houses, we think it important also that their proportionate strength should be as in the White Paper. It follows therefore that since the Upper House is to have a strength of about 250, the Lower House cannot be reduced below the White Paper figure. There are also weighty reasons which affect British India for adhering to the 5 White Paper proposals as regards numbers. If the size of the Council of State were materially reduced and if, as we have recommended, one-third of its membership is replaced every three years, the number of members whom provincial electoral colleges would be called upon to choose at any given election would be too 10 small for the method of the single transferable vote to produce an equitable result from the point of view of minorities, and we should greatly regret the introduction of a communal basis for the Federal Upper House. There is another consideration affecting the Federal House of Assembly. It would be difficult, if the size of this 15 House were reduced, to make any proportionate reduction in the number of seats assigned to special interests, since this would in several instances deprive them of seats which they have in the existing Legislative Assembly. These special interest seats, apart from those assigned to European commerce and industry, would 20 in practice be almost entirely occupied by members of the Hindu community. We think it important that the Muhammadan community should have secured to it, as the White Paper proposes, one-third of all the British-India seats, but if the number of the special interest seats is to remain undisturbed, the application to a 25 substantially smaller House of the undertaking given to the Muhammadans would result in a disproportionate number of the ordinary (non-special) seats being allocated to the Muhammadans.

 The combined effect of the considerations mentioned in this and the preceding paragraph has led us to the conclusion, notwithstanding 30 all the arguments which can be urged on the other side, that the size of the two Houses should stand as in the White Paper.

206 We have set out in the Appendix (II) to this part of our Report¹ a description of the scheme of indirect election which we recommend for the Council of State and for the Federal House of 35 Assembly, so far as the British-India representatives are concerned.
 The details of the scheme are necessarily complex, and we think that they can be better appreciated if dealt with in this manner. It may well be that on further examination parts of the scheme will be found to require readjustment or revision in matters of detail, and 40 we do not desire that our recommendations should be taken as precluding a further expert examination of it.

Details of scheme set out in Appendix

Representation of the States

207 The representatives of the States will be appointed by the Rulers of the States concerned. A difficult question arises, however with regard to the allocation among nearly six hundred States of the 100 and 125 seats available for the States as a whole in the Council of State and Federal House of Assembly respectively. The White Paper does not deal with this matter which we are informed has been under discussion between the Governor-General and the Princes for some time past and we have been furnished with details of a scheme which the Governor-General has propounded as a basis for discussion. This scheme is set out in the Appendix (III) to this part of our Report.¹ It proceeds on the principle that the allocation of seats among the States should in the case of the Council of State, take account of the relative rank and importance of the State as indicated by the dynastic salute and other factors, and in the case of the House of Assembly should be based in the main on population. So far as we are able to judge, a scheme on these lines would be a reasonable one and would be appropriate to the new constitutional arrangements which we contemplate. We observe that it makes provision for the pooling by groups of States of the representation allotted to them individually with the object of securing a form of representation more suited to their common interests, and for giving legal effect to any arrangements so made. We see many advantages in a plan of this kind if it should prove practicable.

Temporary
in representation for non-acceding States.

208 The scheme makes provision for the representation of the whole of the States of India. It may well be however that not all the States will accede at any rate in the early years of the Federation nor could States under a minority administration in any event accede until the Ruler had taken over the government of the State. The White Paper proposes that any vacancies arising from non-accession should for the time being remain unfilled. The States have urged that this arrangement would operate to the prejudice of those States which have in fact acceded in relation to the British-India portion of the Legislature, and we are of opinion that there is substance in the objection. We do not think that it would be reasonable to allocate to the States which accede the whole representation of those who are holding back but we recommend that the representatives of the States which have acceded should be empowered to elect additional representatives in both Houses up to half the number of States seats (including those States whose Rulers are minors) which remain unfilled. We think, however that this arrangement should cease to operate when as a result of accessions 90 per cent of the seats allocated to the States are filled, and in any event at the expiration of 20 years from the establishment of the Federation.

Tenure of
representatives

209 A suggestion was brought to our notice that provision should be made in the Constitution Act for the vacation of his seat by a member of the Legislature appointed by the Ruler of State if called upon to do so by notice in writing from the Ruler. We could not accept this suggestion. We conceive that a State representative although he is nominated and not elected holds his seat by precisely the same tenure as an elected representative from British India and no distinction should be made between the two.

Powers of the Federal Legislature

210 The observations which we have made in connection with the powers of the Provincial Legislatures apply generally, mutatis mutandis, to the Federal Legislature, and we are of opinion that the same general restrictions on the legislative power should apply in both cases. We note that in addition to the legislative proposals which in a Province require the Governor's previous sanction, and will, in the Federal Legislature, require the sanction of the Governor-General, legislative proposals affecting any Reserved Department, the coinage and currency of the Federation, or the powers and duties of the Reserve Bank in relation to the management of currency and exchange, will also require the Governor-General's previous sanction.¹ We have no comment to make on the first of these, which is a necessary corollary on the reservation to the Governor-General of the control over certain Departments, and we deal with the second and third elsewhere in connexion with the Reserve Bank.

211 It is proposed (and we concur) that the Governor-General's powers with regard to assent to, reservation of, or withholding assent from, any Bills presented to him should be the same as in the case of the Governor of a Province, except that the Governor-General reserves a Bill for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure, whereas a Governor reserves it for the consideration of the Governor-General.²

212 It is proposed that the powers of the Federal Legislature shall not extend to the Chief Commissioner's Province of British Baluchistan. The legislation required is to be obtained either by Regulations made by the Governor-General at his discretion or by the application by him to the Province, with or without modification, of any enactment of the Federal Legislature, an arrangement which we are satisfied is the most appropriate which could be devised for an area of this character.³

Procedure in the Federal Legislature

213 On this subject also it is unnecessary to repeat what we have already said in connexion with the Provincial Legislatures. We draw attention, however, to three heads of expenditure which it is proposed should not be submitted to the vote of the Legislature, and which necessarily have no counterpart in the Provinces.⁴ These are (1) expenditure for a Reserved Department, (2) expenditure for the discharge of the functions of the Crown in and arising out of its relations with the Rulers of Indian States, and (3) expenditure for the discharge of the duties imposed by the Constitution Act on the Secretary of State. The inclusion of the first necessarily follows from the reservation of administration and control to the Governor-General. The second would include the expenses of the Political Department and other matters connected with the rights and obligations of Paramount Power. We understand the third to refer to such matters as expenditure in connexion with the Secretary of State's establishment in London, liabilities incurred by him on contracts or engagements to which he is or will become a party under the provisions of the Constitution Act, and payments of compensation to members of the Public Services under his power 10 in that behalf. We have no comments to make on any of these proposals.

Relations between the two Houses.

214. We have pointed out that the Provincial Upper Houses are not intended to be bodies having equal powers with the Legislative Assemblies. In the case of the Federal Legislature, the proposals 15 in the White Paper contemplate two Houses with nearly co-equal powers. The principal difference is in the sphere of finance. It is proposed that Money Bills should only be introduced in the Lower House, the Upper House having power to amend or reject them and that in relation to Demands for Grants the power of the Upper 20 House should be limited to requiring but only at the instance of the Government, that any Demand which has been reduced or rejected by the Lower House should be brought before a Joint Session¹. We entirely endorse the principle that, so far as possible, the two Houses should have equal powers but we are not satisfied that the pro- 25 posals to which we have just referred sufficiently secure this. We think that the Upper House should have wider powers in relation to finance and that it should be able not only to secure that a rejected grant is reconsidered at a Joint Session of the two Houses, but also to refuse its assent to a grant which has been accepted by the Lower 30 House. We think therefore that all Demands should be considered first by the Lower House and subsequently by the Upper and that the powers of each House in relation to any Demand should be identical, any difference of opinion being resolved at a Joint Session to be held forthwith. Consistently with the same principle we think 35 that Money Bills should be capable of introduction in the Upper Chamber as well as in the Lower

215. We approve the plan of resolving the differences between the Houses by the decision of a majority of the two Houses sitting and voting together. But the principle of equality of powers requires 40 that an effective voice in the final decision should be secured to the Upper House and it is for that reason that we have accepted the numerical proportion between the two Houses proposed in the White Paper that is to say a proportion of approximately 3 3. The principle also makes appropriate a departure from the scheme of 45 Joint Sessions which we have recommended in the case of the White Paper, Proposals 33, 41 and 45

Provinces. There is no necessity for so long a period to elapse before the Joint Session is held as in the Provinces, where the functions of the Upper House are only those of revision and delay. We do not think that the White Paper proposals are in all respects satisfactory. In particular we think that there would be an advantage in extending 5 the period after which a Joint Session may be held from three months to six, and in providing that it should not be held during the session of the Legislature in the course of which the difference of opinion arose between the Houses. It should be for the Federal Government to decide whether a Bill is to lapse or be referred to a Joint Session 10 and in the former case the Government should inform the Legislature of their decision before the end of the current session. The above should be the ordinary procedure but in the case of Money Bills Bills affecting the Reserved Departments or Bills which in the opinion of the Governor General involve his special responsibilities 15 the Governor General must have power in his discretion to summon a Joint Session and obtain a decision forthwith. Amendments to any

Bill which is brought before a Joint Session should be subject to the rules which we have recommended in the case of the Provinces

- 20 216 The question was much discussed before us whether any special provision ought to be included in the Constitution Act prohibiting States' representatives from voting on matters of exclusively British-India concern. The British-India Delegation in their Joint Memorandum urge that this should be done, and their suggestions are briefly as follows — (1) that in a division on a matter concerning solely a British-India subject, the States' representatives should not be entitled to vote, (2) that the question whether a matter relates solely to a British-India subject or not should be left to the decision of the Speaker of the House, which should be final, but (3) that if a substantive vote of no confidence is proposed on a matter relating solely to a British-India subject, the States' representatives should be entitled to vote, since the decision might vitally affect the position of a Ministry formed on a basis of collective responsibility, (4) that if the Ministry is defeated on a subject of exclusively British-India interest, it should not necessarily resign. We do not think that these suggestions would in any way meet the case. Circumstances may make any vote of a Legislature, even on a matter intrinsically unimportant, an unmistakable vote of no confidence, the distinction between formal votes of no confidence and other votes is an artificial and conventional one, and it would be impossible to base any statutory enactment upon it. On the other hand, the States have made it clear that they have no desire to interfere in matters of exclusively British-India concern, nor could we suppose that it would be in their interests to do so, but they are anxious, for reasons which we appreciate, that their representatives should not be prevented by any rigid statutory provisions from exercising their own judgment, from supporting a Ministry with whose general policy they are fully in agreement, or from withholding

States' representatives and British-India legislation

- then support from a Ministry whose policy they disapprove. In these circumstances we think that the true solution is to allow the matter to be regulated by the common sense of both sides and by the growth of constitutional practice and usage, and indeed we have no doubt that both parties will find it in their mutual interest to come to some suitable working arrangement at an early stage. We have, however, one suggestion to make which we think may be worth consideration. Under the Standing Orders of the House of Commons all Bills which relate exclusively to Scotland and have been committed to a Standing Committee are referred to a Committee consisting of all the members representing the Scottish constituencies, together with not less than ten nor more than fifteen other members. We think that a provision on these lines might very possibly be found useful, and that the Constitution Act might require that any Bill on a subject included in List III should, if extending only to British India, be referred to a Committee consisting either of all the British-India representatives or a specified number of them, to whom two or three States' representatives could, if it should be thought desirable, be added.

20 (4) THE RELATIONS BETWEEN THE FEDERATION AND THE FEDERAL UNITS

- 217 The transformation of British India from a unitary into a Federal State necessitates a complete readjustment of the relations between the Federal and Provincial Governments. The Provincial Governments are at the present time subordinate to the Central

Administrative relations between the federation and its constituent units

Government and under a statutory obligation to obey its orders and directions though the Central Government, and indeed, the Secretary of State himself is bound by statutory rules not to interfere with the provincial administration save for certain limited purposes in matters which under the devolution rules now fall within the transferred 30 provincial sphere. But though the respective spheres of the Centre and of the Provinces will in future be strictly delimited and the jurisdiction of each (except in the concurrent field which we have described elsewhere) will exclude the jurisdiction of the other the conception of a Federation necessarily implies the existence of a 35 nexus of some kind between the Federation and its constituent units. We have discussed elsewhere in our Report both the legislative and the financial nexus which the White Paper proposes to create and we confine our observations here to the administrative relations between the Federal Government as such on the one hand and the 40 Provincial Governments and the Rulers or Governments of the Indian States on the other

Duty of Government to give effect to federal laws

218. The Federal Legislature will have power to enact legislation on federal subjects which will have the force of law in every Province and, subject to any such limitations as may be contained in the 45 Ruler's Instrument of Accession, in every Indian State which is a member of the Federation. The administration and execution of these laws may be vested in the Federation itself and in federal officers or the Legislature may devolve upon the Provincial Governments or their officers the duty of executing and administering the law on behalf of the Federal Government (in the case of a State this would be done by means of an agreement between the Governor 5 General and the Ruler of the State). In the case of laws relating to subjects in respect of which the Federal and the Provincial Legislatures have concurrent powers of legislation, we understand the intention to be (though the White Paper is by no means clear in this respect) that the functions of administration and execution are 10 to vest in the Provincial Governments. The White Paper proposes that it shall be the duty of a Provincial Government so to exercise its executive power and authority in so far as it is necessary and applicable for the purpose as to secure that due effect is given within the Province to every Act of the Federal Legislature which applies 15 to that Province.¹ This, as we read it, is a statement of the constitutional duty of every Province in relation to federal laws which has no sanction behind it other than the moral obligation which must always rest upon the constituent units of a Federation to give effect to the laws of the political organism of which they form a part. But 20 something more is required to secure the due execution by a provincial Government of laws relating to subjects on which the Federal Legislature is alone competent to legislate and the Federal Government must be empowered to give directions to a provincial Government for the purpose of securing that due effect is given in 25 the Province to any such law and that the manner in which the Provincial Government's executive power and authority is exercised in relation to the administration of the law is in harmony with the policy of the Federal Government.

219. We have said that the White Paper does not make clear the 30 distinction which as it seems to us ought to be drawn in this connexion between federal laws within the exclusive and those within the concurrent field. We think that the Federal Government ought to have power to give directions to a provincial Government legislation in the exclusive and concurrent fields.

25 with regard to the first, but with regard to the second, the administration of which will be essentially a matter of provincial concern, the Provinces must be left to act as they think right, though we hope in no anti-federal spirit. In the case of the States, it is proposed that the Rules should accept the same general moral obligation, 40 which, as we have said, will rest upon the Provincial Governments, to secure that due effect is given within the territory of his State to every Federal Act which applies to that territory.² But we think that the White Paper rightly proposes that any general instructions to the Government of a State for the purpose of ensuring that the 45 federal obligations of the State are duly fulfilled shall come directly from the Governor-General himself.

220 It is, however, necessary to provide for a situation, though we may be permitted to hope that it will never in practice arise, in which a Provincial Government has declined to carry out the directions which it has received from the Federal Government. These directions 5 would be issued in the name of the Governor-General as the executive head of the Federation, in whose name all executive acts will run, but, where (as will commonly be the case) the directions relate to matters within the ministerial sphere, the Governor-General will be acting upon the advice of his Ministers. Among the special responsi-10 bilities of the Governor of a Province is one for "securing the execution of orders lawfully issued by the Governor-General", and, since the directions of which we have spoken would be lawful orders of the Governor-General, it would become the duty of the Governor to secure their execution in opposition to the policy and 15 (it must necessarily follow) to the advice, of his Ministers. We do not think that the Governor of a Province ought to be placed in a position in which in effect he is compelled to over-rule his own Ministers at the instance of federal Ministers, and where a conflict of this kind arises between the Federal Government and the Government of a 20 Province any directions by the Governor-General which require the Governor to dissent from, or to over-rule, the provincial Ministry ought to be given in the Governor-General's discretion. The Governor-General would thus become the arbiter between the Federal and the Provincial Government, and we think that disputes between the two 25 are far more likely to be settled amicably by the Governor-General's discretionary intervention. It cannot be assumed that the fault in cases of this kind will always lie with the Province, the Federal Government may have been tactless or unwise, and the Governor-General should not be under any constitutional obligation to take 30 action against his better judgment, if the effect would only be to accentuate or embitter the dispute.

221 We are of opinion that the proposals in the White Paper on this subject require modification. It should be made clear that the authority of the Federal Government only extends to the giving of 35 directions to a Provincial Government in relation to the administration and execution of Federal Acts with respect to subjects on which the Federal Legislature is alone competent to legislate, and that for the purpose of implementing any directions so issued the Governor-General may in his discretion issue such orders to the Governor 40 as he may think fit. A consequential modification will in that event be required in the definition of the Governor's special responsibility for securing the execution of orders lawfully issued by the Governor-General.

222. The White Paper proposes to empower the Governor General in his discretion to issue instructions to the Governor of a Province as to the manner in which the executive power and authority in the Province is to be exercised for the purpose of preventing any grave menace to the peace and tranquillity of India or any part thereof. ¹ It has been suggested that in view of the special responsibility of the Governor to which we have referred above the proposal is superfluous. We do not think it is. The Governor of a Province is to have a special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of his own Province, and we think that, but for the proposal to which we have referred his special responsibility for securing the execution of orders lawfully issued by the Governor General would necessarily be read as referring to the execution of orders issued by the Governor General within the sphere of the Governor's statutory functions. But, to take one example which occurs to us, a conspiracy in one Province to disturb the peace and tranquillity of another might well be outside the Governor's special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of his own Province and since we have no doubt that an ultimate and residuary responsibility for the peace and tranquillity of the whole of India must vest in the Governor General, it is plain that the latter's power to give directions to a Governor should be wide enough to cover this case, and that it should be obligatory on a Governor to give effect to those directions even though it is the peace of a neighbouring Province and not his own which is endangered inter-

White Paper Proposal 126.

disputes.

223. We do not observe any proposals in the White Paper dealing with disputes or differences between one Province and another other than disputes involving legal issues for the determination of which the Federal Court is the obvious and necessary forum. Yet it cannot be supposed that interprovincial disputes will never arise and we have considered whether it would not be desirable to provide some constitutional machinery for disposing of them. At the present time the Governor General in Council has the power to decide questions arising between two Provinces in cases where the Provinces concerned fail to arrive at an agreement in relation to both transferred and reserved subjects but plainly it would be impossible to vest such a power in the Governor General or in the Governor-General or Federal Ministry after the establishment of Provincial Autonomy though we do not doubt that the good offices of both will always be available for the purpose. But after careful consideration we have come to the conclusion that it would be unwise to include in the new Constitution any permanent machinery for the settlement of disputes of the sort which we have in mind, and in our opinion the more prudent course will be to leave the Provinces free to develop such extra-constitutional machinery as the future course of events may show to be desirable. There will be necessarily many subjects on which interprovincial consultation will be necessary as indeed has proved to be the case even at the present time and we anticipate that sooner or later a system of provincial conferences, held at regular intervals will come into existence as we believe has happened in Canada. Suggestions for a formal Inter Provincial Council have been made to us, but we do not think that the time is yet ripe for this. The assistance of Parliament may one day be invoked for the purpose of creating such a Council, but we think that this is a matter on which Indian opinion will be better able to form a considered judgment after some experience in the working of the new Constitution

224 There is however one subject with respect to which we are of opinion that specific provision ought to be made. The Government of India has always possessed what may be called a common law right to use and control in the public interest the water supplies of the country, and a similar right has been asserted by the legislation of more than one Province as regards the water supplies of the Province. "Water supplies" is now a provincial subject for legislation and administration, but the Central Legislature may also legislate upon it 'with regard to matters of inter-provincial concern or affecting the relations of a Province with any other territory'. Its administration in a Province is reserved to the Governor in Council, and is therefore under the ultimate control of the Secretary of State, with whom the final decision rests when claims or disputes arise between one Provincial Government and another, or between a Province and a State. This control of the Secretary of State obviously could not continue under the new Constitution, but it seems to us impossible to dispense altogether with a central authority of some kind.

225 The White Paper proposes to give to the Provinces exclusive legislative power in relation to "water supplies, irrigation and canals, drainage and embankments, water storage and water power," and reserves no powers of any kind to the Federal Government or Legislature.¹ The effect of this is to give each Province complete powers over water supplies within the Province without any regard whatever to the interests of neighbouring Provinces. The Federal Court would indeed have jurisdiction to decide any dispute between two Provinces in connection with water supplies, if legal rights or interests were concerned, but the experience of most countries has shown that rules of law based upon the analogy of private proprietary interests in water do not afford a satisfactory basis for settling disputes between Provinces or States where the interests of the public at large in the proper use of water supplies are involved. It is unnecessary to emphasise the importance from the public point of view of the distribution of water in India, upon which not only the prosperity, but the economic existence, of large tracts depends.

226 We do not think that it would be desirable, or indeed feasible, to make the control of water supplies a wholly federal subject but for the reasons which we have given it seems to us that complete provincialization might on occasion involve most unfortunate consequences. We suggest therefore that where a dispute arises between two units of the Federation with respect to an alleged use

A provincial subject under the White Paper

Modification of White Paper proposals suggested

¹ White Paper, Appendix VI, List II

by one unit of its executive or legislative powers in relation to water supplies in a manner detrimental to the interests of the other, the aggrieved unit should be entitled to appeal to the Governor-General acting in his discretion, and that the Governor-General should be empowered to adjudicate on the application. We think, however, that the Governor-General, unless he thinks fit summarily to reject the application, should be required to appoint an Advisory Tribunal for the purpose of investigating and reporting upon the complaint. The Tribunal would be appointed ad hoc, and would be an expert body whose functions would be to furnish the Governor General with such technical information as he might require for the purposes of his decision and to make recommendations to him. Such recommendations, though they would naturally carry great weight with the Governor-General, would not necessarily be binding on him, and he would be free to decide the dispute in such manner as he thought fit. We think also that provision should be made for excluding the jurisdiction of the Federal Court in the case of any dispute which could be referred to the Governor General in the manner which we have suggested. We should not propose that the powers of the Governor General should extend to a case where one unit is desirous of securing the right to make use of water supplies in the territory of another unit, but only to the case of one unit using water to the detriment of another. With this limitation we believe that the plan would be a workable one and that it could not reasonably be regarded as inconsistent with the conception of Provincial Autonomy.

Central Research.

227 We have found occasion in later paragraphs to draw attention to the importance of the co-ordination of research in connection with the special subjects of Forestry and Irrigation. It is a matter very relevant to any consideration of the future relations between the Federal and Provincial Governments. Whatever criticisms may have been levelled in the past against an excessive centralisation of government in India they can have little application to the facilities thereby created for the pooling of ideas and of methods so as to enable the whole of India to benefit from the administrative experience of every part. It would be deplorable if the establishment of Provincial Autonomy were to lead the Provinces to suppose that each could regard itself as self-sufficient, or to tempt the Centre to disinterest itself in the efforts which it has made in the past to collect and co-ordinate information for general use. If our recommendations are adopted, the existing central research institutions will remain under the exclusive control of the Federal Government, but they can only flourish if assured that the interest and support of the Provincial and States Governments are still assured to them. The Statutory Commission made special reference to the Council of Agricultural Research which was established as a result of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Agriculture in India, and we agree with them in thinking that similar institutions might with advantage be established in other fields, such as Public Health and Education.

APPENDIX (II)

SCHEME FOR ELECTION OF BRITISH INDIA REPRESENTATIVES TO COUNCIL OF STATE AND HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Council of State

1 The British India representatives will number 150 elected in the 5 manner described below together with 6 members nominated by the Governor-General in his discretion.

2 The members other than those nominated will be elected in three separate Divisions A, B and C.

Members in Division A will retire after three years from the date when 10 the House is first constituted and thereafter every nine years.

Those in Division B after six years from that date and thereafter every nine years.

The Union Division C after nine years from that date and thereafter every ten years.

The members to be elected for each of the three Divisions will be allocated as follows —

	1	2	3	Total
20
Madras	0	10	10	20
Bombay	8	0	8	16
Bihar	10	0	10	20
United Provinces	10	10	0	20
Punjab	8	8	0	16
India	0	8	8	16
25
Central Provinces (with Berar)	0	8	0	8
Assam	0	0	0	0
North-West Frontier Province	0	0	5	5
Sindh	5	0	0	5
Orissa	5	0	0	5
30
Coorg	0	0	1	1
Andhra	0	0	1	1
Bihar	0	0	1	1
Chandigarh	0	0	1	1
Hyderabad	1	0	1	2 35
Andhra Pradesh	0	0	1	1
Madras	0	1	7	7
Total	50	50	50	150

5 The Indian Christian, Anglo Indian and European members will be chosen by the Electoral College of their own for the whole of British India, composed of a body of the Indian Christian, Anglo Indian and European members of the Provincial Legislatures (including members from the Upper Houses of bicameral Provinces). The method of voting by the European Electoral College, when more than one seat is to be filled will be the single transferable vote.

15 4 In the Provinces of Madras, Bombay, United Provinces and Bihar the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Upper House voting alone will elect one member for each of the two Divisions of the Federal Upper House in which the Province is represented. The remainder of the seats allocated to the Governor's Provinces, apart from the 8 seats, will be filled in the following manner —

(a) In the bicameral Governor's Provinces the members will be elected by all the members of the Provincial Upper House (except Indian Christian, Anglo Indian and European members) by means of the single transferable vote.

(b) In the unicameral Governor's Provinces, where Upper Houses do not exist, the members will be elected by a specially constituted Electoral College by means of the single transferable vote. The composition of these Electoral Colleges will be as follows —

5	Province	General.	Sikh	Muham- madan	Total
	Punjab	16	11	30	57
	Central Provinces (with Berar)	31	—	5	36
	Assam	21	—	12	33
10	North-West Frontier Province	5	1	19	25
	Sindh	10	—	18	28
	Orissa	27	—	3	30

Members of the Electoral Colleges will be chosen by direct election from territorial communal constituencies. The franchise will be similar to that employed in other Provinces for direct election to the Provincial Upper House.

5 Special provisions will be necessary for the selection of the representative from Chief Commissioners' Provinces, except in the case of Coorg where the representative will be elected by members of the Coorg Legislature.

20 6 When the Federal Council of State is constituted for the first time, on that occasion, and on that occasion only, members of all three Divisions will have to be elected at the same time. There will therefore, in the case of six Provinces the candidates for two different Divisions simultaneously. The election will take place first for the Division which will be re-elected later 25 than the other one. Those candidates who are not successful in the election for that Division will form the candidates for the immediately following election for the other Division.¹

7 Casual vacancies among the elected members of the Council of State will, so long as communal representation is retained as a feature of the Constitution, be filled by election by those members of the Provincial Upper House (or Electoral College) who are members of the Community to which the vacating member belongs as proposed in the White Paper.²

8 It will be observed that although one third of the Council of State will be renewed at a time the representatives of any given Province will be renewed half at a time in the larger Governors Provinces and the whole at a time 35 in other Provinces. The object of this arrangement is to avoid reducing the number of seats to be filled at any Provincial election to an extent which would be likely to have the effect of producing inequitable results from the system of proportional representation.

9 The object of the provision of eight seats to be filled by Muhammadan 40 electors only is to secure that the Mohammadan community should be in a position to secure one-third of all the British India seats if every Muhammadan elector in using first and succeeding preferences gave priority to all candidates of his own community.

It will probably be found possible to avoid a double reference to the voters. After the election to one Division is completed the election to the other Division could presumably take place on the basis of the original voting papers the names of the candidates already successful for the other Division being eliminated and the preferences on the voting papers being remembered accordingly.

White Paper Proposal 8.

We agree with the proposal in the White Paper¹ that the Muhammadan community should be placed in a position in which they could achieve this result and it is unlikely that they would be able to do so without the allocation to them of those few specifically communal seats. This special provision is analogous to that which the Secretary of State for India has 5 proposed for the same purpose in modification of Appendix I of the White Paper.²

10 In the Governors Provinces a candidate will be qualified for election to the Council of State if he (or she) is qualified for election to the Provincial Upper Chamber (or Electoral College as the case may be) 10

Special provisions will be required for the qualifications of other candidates.

Federal House of Assembly

11 The British India representatives in the Assembly will number 250 elected in the manner described below.

12. The allocation of seats between Provinces and between the various 15 special interests and communities will be in accordance with the numbers set out in the Table in Appendix II of the White Paper.

13 The method of election to the special interest seats, that is to say to the special seats assigned for women, commerce and industry, landholders and labour will be as proposed in Appendix II to the White Paper. 20

14. In the Governors Provinces election to the seats in the Assembly allocated as General or Muhammadan will be by the members of the Provincial Lower House who hold respectively General or Muhammadan seats in that House. Members who hold special interest seats in the Provincial Lower House will not participate. In the Punjab those members who hold Sikh seats in the 25 Provincial Legislature will let to the six Sikh seat from the Punjab in the Assembly. Subject to the following provision relating to the Depressed Classes the method of voting within each of the above groups of electors will be the single transferable vote.

15 In the case of General seats it would be a simplification if there were 30 no seats reserved for the Depressed Classes, reliance being placed on the

- proportional representation system to secure a due share of the General seats for the members of the Depressed Classes. Unless, however, the adoption of such a course were agreed between the caste Hindus and Depressed Classes, we regard it as desirable to avoid disturbing, so far as possible, the arrangements in the White Paper for Depressed Classes representation in the Federal Lower House which are based on the Poona Pact. Accordingly, out of the General seats there will be reserved for the Depressed Classes the number of seats indicated in Appendix II to the White Paper.
- 16 The following seems to be a possible method for combining procedure for reservation of seats with the use of the single transferable vote. After the voting papers have been received, and before the single transferable vote procedure is applied, those Depressed Class candidates, up to a number equal to that of the reserved seats, who receive the highest number of first preferences would be declared to be elected. The single transferable vote procedure would then be applied for the election to the remaining general seats. It is necessary to provide, in accordance with the Poona Pact, that the only candidates qualified to be elected to the reserved seats should be those elected by a primary to a number equal to four times the number of reserved seats. In order to constitute a primary of adequate size, we think that it might consist, not only of those members of the Provincial Lower House who hold the seats reserved therein for Depressed Classes but also of those who were successful candidates at the primary Depressed Class elections for the Provincial Lower House though they did not secure seats at the final election for that House.

² Evidence, Answer to Question 7811

- 17 The seats allocated to Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians and Europeans will be filled by election by three Electoral Colleges of their own composed of all those who hold respectively Indian Christian, Anglo-Indian and European seats in the Provincial Lower Houses. Those who hold special interest seats in those Houses will not participate. These Electoral Colleges, composed of members from all the Provinces, will elect separately the member from each Province to which is allocated an Indian Christian,¹ Anglo-Indian or European seat.

18 Special provisions will be necessary for the selection of the representatives from Chief Commissioners' Provinces, except in the case of Coorg, where the representative will be elected by members of the Coorg Legislature.

19 In Governors' Provinces (and Coorg) a candidate will be qualified for election to a seat in the Federal Assembly (other than a special interest seat) if he is qualified for election to the Provincial Lower House for a General, Muhammadan or Sikh seat, as the case may be. Qualifications for a candidate for those General seats which are reserved for the Depressed Classes will be as described above.

Special provisions will be required for the qualifications of candidates in Chief Commissioners' Provinces other than Coorg.

¹ In Madras there are two Indian Christian seats. Voting for these will be by means of the single transferable vote.

APPENDIX (III)

Scheme of distribution of States seats in Federal Legislature as proposed by Governor General as basis of discussion.

In Annexure A below list I includes (a) the seats allotted to certain States individually which are not included in the regional lists II IX which follow; 5
(b) the total number of seats allotted to the States with continuous or alternating representation included in each of the regional lists II IX and
(c) the total number of seats allotted in list X to the joint representation of groups of minor non salute states which are not included in the regional lists Annexure B gives the States accorded individual representation in 10 order of salute and population with the representation allotted to each.

There are 104 States seats in the Council of State. Four seats have been added to the 100 seats referred to in the body of the Report in place of the States share (40 per cent) of the 10 seats which the White Paper proposed should be filled by nomination by the Governor General. The nominated 15 seats in the Council of State will accordingly be reduced to six from British India.

The 104 seats available in the Council of State have been divided into three categories: (a) those to be filled continuously by one State (b) those to be filled in alternation by two or more States, as shown in groups in lists II IX, 10 and (c) those to be filled by the representatives of the groups of minor States given in list X. The three categories having been determined with a view to enabling as many States as possible to enjoy individual representation with due regard to their relative importance and where a seat is shared between two or more to their proximity. 2

The 125 seats available in the House of Assembly have been distributed roughly on a population basis but in such a way as to reduce slightly the number of seats available to the most populous States so as to secure separate representation for as many States as possible. So far as possible the groups for alternating representation of States in a single seat proposed for the Council 30 of State have been retained for the Assembly. But it is intended that in the latter Chamber the States grouped together shall nominate joint representatives instead of having the option of occupying in turn the seat allotted to them.

It is proposed that group representation shall be subject to the following provisions. If not less than half the number of Rulers combined in a particular 35 group accede to Federation, they shall be entitled to fill the seat allotted to the group. To meet cases of difficulty when less than 50 per cent. of the members of a group accede to Federation, the Governor-General should be empowered to determine disputes and to vary the composition of groups when necessity arises. The members of an alternating group shall be entitled, 40 each in turn to appoint a representative for a period of one calendar year. But if States so prefer they may pool their allotted quota of seats with those of other States so as to be represented by joint nominees thus possibly, where entitled under the scheme only to a seat in rotation, securing instead continuous joint representation. To enable such arrangements to be made 45 voluntarily between States the Governor-General shall be empowered to vary the distribution of groups as scheduled to the Constitution Act where necessity arises subject to his being satisfied that the arrangements proposed would not adversely affect the rights and interests of other States which do 50 not desire to participate therein.

our recommendations will have the effect of preserving in the limited 10 sphere of the concurrent field the main feature of the existing system but we feel no doubt that the White Paper correctly insists upon a statutory allocation of exclusive jurisdictions to the Centre and the Provinces respectively as the only possible foundation for the Provincial Autonomy which we contemplate. We are fully 15 sensible of the immense practical advantages of the present system, and of the uncertainties and litigation which have followed elsewhere from a statutory delimitation of competing jurisdictions but we are satisfied that a relationship between Centre and Provinces, in which each depends in the last resort for the scope of its legislative 20 jurisdiction on the decision of the Central Executive as represented by the Governor-General, would form no tolerable basis for an enduring Constitution and would be inconsistent with the whole conception of autonomous Provinces.

The revised Lists.

231. The Lists, as they appear in Appendix VI to the White Paper 25 are described as illustrative and do not purport to be either complete or final. Since their publication, however they have been subjected to a careful scrutiny by the Government of India and the Provincial Governments, whose criticisms have in their turn been examined by the framers of the original Lists and the results of this scrutiny 30 and examination have been placed at our disposal. In the light of this further information we are satisfied (though the final form must be a matter for the draftsman) that the revised Lists which we append to this chapter represent a workable and appropriate allocation of legislative powers. 35

Two Lists or as the method of defining executive jurisdictions.

232. We confine our attention for the moment to Lists I and II which define respectively the exclusive jurisdiction of the Centre and of the Provinces. We believe that the attempt which these Lists represent to allocate by enumeration with any approach to completeness the functions of legislation including taxation to rival Legislatures is 40 without precedent. In other Constitutions the method adopted has usually been to specify exhaustively the subjects allocated to one Legislature and to assign to the other the whole of the unspecified residue, and this method has not only the merit of simplicity but diminishes greatly the opportunity for litigation. But, as we have 45

said elsewhere opinion in India is sharply divided into two opposing schools of thought, one of which refuses to countenance the bias in favour of the Centre, which is assumed to follow from the possession by the Centre of residual powers, while the other as rigidly refuses to concede the possession of these powers to the Provinces. We are 5 ourselves convinced that the laborious and careful enumeration of both sets of subjects has secured that in fact no material and no foreseen accretion of power either to Centre or Provinces would result from the elimination of one List or the other and we are satisfied that the process has reduced the residue to proportions 10 negligible that the apprehensions which have been felt on one side or the other are without foundation. Recognising however the strength of Indian feeling on this matter we are unwilling to disturb the compromise embodied in the White Paper the effect of which is to empower the Governor-General acting in his discretion to 15 allocate the Centre or Province as he may think fit the right to legislate on any matter which is not covered by the enumeration in the Lists. We are conscious of the objections to this proposal

Relations between Centre and Provinces
in the concurrent
field.

234. There are obvious attractions to those who wish to see the freedom and initiative of the Provinces as unfettered as possible in an attempt to ensure by provisions in the Constitution Act that the powers of the Centre in the concurrent field are to be capable of use only where an all India necessity is established, and where the enactment in question can appropriately be and in fact is, applied to every Province. We are clearly of opinion that such a restriction, apart from the prospect of litigation which it opens up would tend to defeat the objects we have had in view in revising the List of concurrent subjects. For similar reasons we should strongly deprecate any provision requiring the prior assent of the Provinces, or of a majority of them as a condition precedent to the exercise by the Centre of its powers in this field or the condition suggested in the White Paper that the Centre is to be debarred from so using its powers in respect of a concurrent subject as to impose financial obligation on the Provinces. We recognise that, in practice it will be impossible for the Centre to utilise its powers in the concurrent field without satisfying itself in advance that the Governments to whose territories a projected measure will apply are, in fact, satisfied with its provisions and are prepared in cases where it will throw extra burdens upon provincial resources to recommend to their own

Legislatures the provision of the necessary supply but we consider that the practical relationships which are to develop between Centre and Provinces in this limited field must be left to work themselves out by constitutional usage and the influence of public opinion and that no useful purpose would be served by attempting to prescribe them by means of rigid legal sanctions and prohibitions. Nevertheless we regard it as essential to satisfactory relations between Centre and Provinces in this field that the Federal Government before initiating legislation of the kind which we are discussing should ascertain provincial opinion by calling into conference with themselves representatives of the Governments concerned. It follows that, while we fully accept the proposals in the White Paper for defining the constitutional duties and obligations of Provincial Governments in relation to the execution of Federal Acts of all kinds whether they relate to matters included in List I or to those in List III we think that they need qualification in so far as they are intended to empower the Federal Government to issue mandatory directions to the Provinces. Such a power is clearly essential in relation to the federal field proper but we do not think that it should extend to matters relating to the execution of federal laws in the concurrent field. At the same time we recommend that, although no statutory limitation should be imposed upon the exercise by the Centre of its legislative powers in the concurrent field the Governor General should be given guidance in his Instrument of Instructions as to the manner in which he is to exercise the discretion which the White Paper proposes to vest in him in relation to matters arising in the concurrent field.

235. We observe with interest a proposal in the White Paper that in order to minimize uncertainties of law and opportunities for litigation provision should be made for limiting the period within which the validity of an Act may be called in question on the ground that it was not within the competence of the Legislature which enacted it.¹ We know of no precedent for a provision of this kind, though there are enactments in this country which make certain forms of subordinate or delegated legislation unchallengeable in the Courts.

Relations
between Centre and Provinces
in the concurrent
field.

234. There are obvious attractions to those who wish to see the freedom and initiative of the Provinces as unfettered as possible in an attempt to ensure by provisions in the Constitution Act that the powers of the Centre in the concurrent field are to be capable of use only where an all India necessity is established, and where the enactment in question can appropriately be and in fact is, applied to every Province. We are clearly of opinion that such a restriction apart from the prospect of litigation which it opens up would tend to defeat the objects we have had in view in revising the List of concurrent subjects. For similar reasons we should strongly deprecate any provision requiring the prior assent of the Provinces, or of a majority of them, as a condition precedent to the exercise by the Centre of its powers in this field or the condition suggested in the White Paper that the Centre is to be debarred from so using its powers in respect of a concurrent subject as to impose financial obligation on the Provinces. We recognise that in practice, it will be impossible for the Centre to utilise its powers in the concurrent field without satisfying itself in advance that the Governments to whose territories a projected measure will apply are, in fact, satisfied with its provisions and are prepared in cases where it will throw extra burdens upon provincial resources to recommend to their own

Alterations
suggested in the entries relating to the defence
of India

238 The revised Lists also contain a number of changes of substance. Apart from a considerable revision of the language of the first five entries of List I as they appear in the White Paper which collectively define the ambit of the reserved subject of Defence the first entry the common defence of India in tune of an emergency declared by the Governor General has been omitted entirely. The intention of this item was we understand, to give the Federal Legislature (and in consequence the Governor General for the purposes of his personal legislative power) extensive powers on the lines of the English Defence of the Realm Act. We fully agree that it is essential that such a power should be vested in the Federal authorities but we are of opinion that it should not be left to be deduced from a schedule of legislative powers but should be the subject of an express provision in the body of the Act. We are informed that it was only by a majority of one that five Judges of the High Court of Australia decided that the power to legislate for defence in the Commonwealth Constitution Act justified legislation on the lines of the Defence of the Realm Act and the provision which we recommend in order to place this vital matter beyond doubt should make it clear that the emergency power in question is not limited to defence in the sense of repelling external aggression but that it covers internal disturbance also and that where an emergency has been declared by the Governor-General the Federal Legislature may make on any subject laws which will override any laws which conflict with them the Governor-General's personal legislative power being of course co-extensive in this respect with the power of the Federal Legislature. As an additional safeguard we would require that every proposal for legislation in the exercise of this power should be subject to the previous consent of the Governor General. We recognise that the inclusion of internal disturbance (which should be defined in terms which will ensure that for this purpose it must be comparable in gravity to the repelling of external aggression) among the circumstances which in an emergency will enable the Governor-General to confer upon himself or upon the Federal Legislature as the case may be the power to invade the exclusively provincial sphere and to override provincial legislation within that sphere, may be criticised as a derogation from the general plan of Provincial Autonomy which we advocate but in the absence of such a power we could not regard the Governor-General as adequately armed to discharge the ultimate responsibility which rests upon him for the peace and tranquillity of the whole of India.

Other
in the Lists

239 It would extend this chapter to an unreasonable length if we were to set out in detail all the changes which a revision of the three Lists has involved. We are the less willing to do so because we recognise that the revised Lists themselves will require further expert scrutiny before they are finally submitted to Parliament as part of the legislative proposals of His Majesty's Government. We think however that if the revised lists are compared with the Lists in the White Paper such changes as have been made in addition to those already mentioned will for the most part be found to speak for themselves.

existing Indian law. But it will clearly be necessary before the Act comes into force to redistribute all powers conferred by that law so as to make them conform to the distribution of powers effected by the Constitution Act.

(2) FEDERAL FINANCE

Two-fold division subject.

241 This subject falls naturally into two parts first, the allocation of the sources of revenue between the Federation and the Units and second, the additional expenditure involved by the proposed constitutional changes. We have had the advantage of a comprehensive and objective review of the facts and figures relating to both parts of the subject by Sir Malcolm Hailey which has been printed among the Records of the Committee. We reproduce here from this document the figures of estimated revenue and expenditure of the Central and Provincial Governments for 1933-34, in order that it may be possible to view in proper perspective the various questions dealt with below.

Allocation of Sources of Revenue between the Federation and the Federal Units

The allocation of resources a problem common to all Federal States

242 In any Federation the problem of the allocation of resources is necessarily one of difficulty since two different authorities (the Government of the Federation and the Government of the Unit) each with independent powers, are raising money from the same body of taxpayers. The constitutional problem is simplified if it is possible to allocate separate fields of taxation to the two authorities.

but the revenues derived from such a division, even where it is practicable, may not fit the economic and financial requirements of each party; neither do these requirements necessarily continue to bear a constant relation to each other, and yet it is difficult to devise 5 a variable allocation of resources. So far as we are aware, no entirely satisfactory solution of this problem has yet been found in any federal system

213 So far as British India is concerned the problem is not a new one. Though the separation of the resources of the Government of 10 India and the Provincial Governments under the existing Constitution is in legal form merely an act of statutory devolution, which can be varied by the Government of India and Parliament at any time, nevertheless from the practical financial point of view there is 15 already in existence in British India a federal system of finance. This system is fully described in the Report of the Statutory Commission. Determined to avoid the inconveniences which had already been experienced from a system of "doles" from the Centre to the 20 Provinces or from a system of heads of revenue shared between the two Parties, the authors of the present Constitution adopted an almost completely rigid separation of the sources of revenue assigned respectively to the Centre and to the Provinces. From the point of view of expenditure, the essentials of the position are (and no change in this respect is to be expected) that the Provinces have an almost inexhaustible field for the development of social services
 25 while the demands upon the Centre, except in time of war or acute frontier trouble, are more constant in character. The Provinces have rarely had means adequate for a full development of their social needs, while the Centre, with taxation at a normal level, has no greater margin than is requisite in view of the vital necessity for 30 maintaining unimpaired both the efficiency of the defence services and the credit of the Government of India which rests fundamentally upon the credit of India as a whole, Centre and Provinces together.

244 Both Centre and Provinces have, however, been severely affected by the world economic depression, and the financial position
 35 of both has been severely strained. Rates of taxation have had to be increased in all directions, and every department of government has had to submit to retrenchment, but the way in which the strain has been borne is a tribute to the essential soundness of the present financial system. Past experience of the existing system leads to 40 two conclusions on which there is general agreement: (a) that there are a few Provinces where the available sources of revenue are never likely to be sufficient to meet any reasonable standard of expenditure, and (b) that the existing division of heads of revenue between Centre and Provinces leaves the Centre with an undue share
 45 of those heads which respond most readily to an improvement in economic conditions. This has led to a very strong claim by the provinces for a substantial share in the taxes on income. This claim as might be expected, has been pressed most vigorously by the more industrialised Provinces like Bombay and Bengal especially as their relative position was not improved by the abolition of the contributions which at the date of the establishment of the present constitution were paid by the Provinces to the Centre and subject to the federal income tax, there are many factors to be taken into account. Some of the federal expenditure will be for British India purposes only, such as subsidies to deficit British India Provinces, there has also been controversy on the question whether the service of part of the pre-Federation debt should not fall on British India alone, and further, part of the proceeds of taxes on income is derived from subjects of Indian States, e.g., holders of Indian Government securities and shareholders in British India Companies. The States also make a contribution in kind to defence of which there is no counterpart in the Provinces of British India. It seems to us both unnecessary and undesirable to attempt any accurate balancing of these factors or to determine on a basis of this kind what share of the income tax could equitably be retained by the Federation. It will be wiser to base the division upon the financial and economic needs of the Federation and the Units. Nor is it likely that any disequilibrium between British India and the States that might result from such a method of treatment would be of a serious character. The difficulty is rather that the Federal Centre is unlikely, at least for some time to come, to be able to spare much, if anything, by way of fresh resources for the Provinces, apart from the pressing needs of deficit areas to which we refer below. But it is equally undesirable to leave the Provinces with no indication of the share which they may ultimately expect when the strain of present economic difficulties becomes less severe. It is also necessary that any transfer should be gradual, if dislocation of both federal and provincial budgets is to be avoided.

 5 were relatively larger in the case of the more completely agricultural Provinces

248 The solution of this problem proposed in the White Paper may be briefly described as follows¹. Taxes on income derived from federal sources, i.e., federal areas or emoluments of federal officers, will be permanently assigned to the Federation. Of the yield of the rest of the normal taxes on income (except the corporation tax referred to later) a specified percentage (to be fixed by Order in Council at the last possible moment) is to be assigned to the Provinces. This percentage is to be not less than 50 per cent nor more than 75 per cent. Out of the sum so assigned to the Provinces the Federal Government will be entitled to retain an amount which will remain constant for three years and will thereafter be reduced gradually to zero over a further period of seven years, power being reserved to the Governor-General to suspend these reductions, if circumstances made it necessary to do so. The Federal Government and Legislature would, in addition, be empowered to impose a surcharge on taxes on income, the proceeds of which would be devoted solely to federal purposes. We understand it to be implicit in this proposal that the power should only be exercisable in times of serious financial stress, and when such surcharges are in operation the States would make contributions to the federal fisc, assessed on a predetermined basis, so as to make them a fair counterpart of the yield of the surcharges from British India. The conditions under which the States are ready to accept this proposal were explained in a statement made to us on behalf of the Indian States Delegates¹, and we agree that conditions of the kind mentioned are not unreasonable.

249 Some obvious criticisms can be made on this plan for dealing with the taxes on income. If a specified percentage of the yield of taxes on income is to be assigned to the Provinces, any alteration in the rate of tax will affect both parties (Federation and Provinces),

Criticisms of the proposal

though there may be only one which desires either an increase or a diminution in the yield. It may be suggested that the yield of a given basic rate should be assigned either to the Federation or the Provinces the remainder going to the other. We are, however, informed that a plan of this kind would not fit well into the Indian income tax system which differs considerably from the British. It is also said that the anomaly is more apparent than real since at least for many years to come both Federation and Provinces will need as much money as can be obtained from taxes on income and the fixing of the rate is likely to depend more on taxable capacity than on the precise budgetary position at any given moment of either.

Modifica-
suggested

250 We agree that the percentage which is ultimately to be attained should be fixed as late as possible by Order in Council but we see little or no prospect of the possibility of fixing a higher percentage than 50 per cent. even as an ultimate objective and there is an obvious difficulty in prescribing in advance as the White Paper does, a time-table for the process of transfer, even though power is reserved to the Governor-General to suspend the process (or as we assume, its initiation). The facts discussed below indicate that for some time to come the Centre is unlikely to be able to do much more than find the funds necessary for the deficit Provinces and that an early distribution of any substantial part of the taxes on income is improbable. We think that it would be an improvement if the periods of three and seven years, instead of being fixed by statute were controlled by Order in Council (the Governor-General's power to suspend being of course retained).

Minutes of Evidence Q 802

Suggestion of British India
Delegation

251 The Joint Memorandum of the British India Delegation recognises the difficulty of predetermining the various factors in this problem and recommends an enquiry after three years. The Delegation do not state by what authority they consider that any decision consequent upon it should be taken, but perhaps intend that the decision should rest with the Federal Government. This does not seem fair to the Provinces.

Objections of Bengal and Bombay

252 A further objection has been taken by some witnesses that it is not fair to Provinces such as Bengal and Bombay that the transfer of the provincial share of taxes on income should be delayed and that so long as the Federation cannot spare the money there should be some equitable form of contribution to the Federation from all the Provinces alike. But any plan of this kind must inevitably lead in effect to a return to a system of provincial contributions which has been explored and abandoned. We do not recommend such a course.

commended

253. It must be admitted that the White Paper proposal for dealing with taxes on income present many difficulties but the problem does not admit of any facile solution and except for the suggestion made above we do not ourselves feel able to propose an improved scheme. We should add that the actual method of distribution between the Provinces of any share in the taxes on income is a technical problem of some complexity. The report of the Federal Finance Committee suggests a useful line of approach and we do not think that it is part of our duty to suggest a detailed scheme.

Corporation Tax

254 There are two further questions connected with taxes on income on which some comment is desirable. The White Paper proposes to treat specially the taxes on the income or capital of companies.

- 35 We understand this to refer to taxes of the nature of the existing Corporation Tax which is a supertax on the profits of companies. It is proposed that the Federation should retain the yield of this tax and that after ten years the tax should be extended to the States a right being reserved to any State 40 which prefers that companies subject to the law of the State should not be directly taxed to pay itself to the federal fisc an equivalent lump sum contribution. We approve this proposal, although the details of the arrangement with the States seem likely to be complex.

White Paper, Proposal 14¹

- 255 The White Paper also proposes that Provincial Legislature should be empowered to impose a surcharge not exceeding 12½ per cent on the taxes levied on the personal income of persons resident in the Province and to retain the proceeds for its own purposes.¹ Provincial surcharges
- 5 There is we understand a considerable difference of opinion in India on this suggestion. It might lead to differential rates of tax on the inhabitants of different Provinces, and although a limit would be set to the possible differences, this is in itself undesirable. The rates of taxes on income are likely also to be 10 sufficiently high to make it difficult to increase the rate by way of surcharge, and to give the Provinces such a power might well nullify the emergency power of imposing a surcharge which we think it essential that the Federation should possess. On the other hand, the proposal would undoubtedly give an elasticity to 15 provincial revenues, which would be very desirable until the transfer of their share of the income tax is completed. But after balancing the considerations on either side, we are on the whole not in favour of it.

- 256 We come now to the question of deficit Provinces. The problem of Sind differs from that of the others, since it is not expected that this Province will permanently remain a deficit area. Other Provinces, notably Orissa and Assam, are, so far as can be foreseen, areas in which there is no likelihood that revenue and expenditure can be made to balance under the general scheme of allocation of 25 resources, present or proposed, and in these cases it is intended that there shall be a fixed subvention from the federal revenues.² Although it will no doubt be necessary to make it constitutionally possible after a period of years to vary the amount, we understand that the intention is, so far as possible, to make it a permanent and stable
 30 contribution and thus to avoid the danger that the Province, instead of developing its resources, may be tempted to rely on expectations of extended federal assistance, and we agree. It is proposed that the Provinces to be assisted and the amounts of the subvention should be determined after further expert enquiry at as late a 35 date as possible. The case of the North West Frontier Province stands on a different footing. This Province is at present in receipt of a contribution of a crore of rupees (75)³ annually from the Centre, the need for which arises mainly from special expenditure in the Province due to strategic considerations, though 40 not strictly to be classified as Defence expenditure. In this case it seems essential that there should be power to review the amount from time to time, though here also too frequent changes would be open to the objection to which we have referred above.

Excise and export duties.

257 The White Paper proposals introduce two new features into the plan for the division of resources apart from the arrangements discussed above. Subject to the approval of the Governor-General in his discretion power is given to the Federation to allot to the Federal Units (and not merely to the Provinces) a share of the yield of salt duties and of excise duties, other than those specifically assigned to the Provinces, and also of export duties.¹ We understand that the main purpose of this provision in relation to salt duties and excises is to make the financial scheme more elastic in the interest of future developments and it is very probable that a power to assign a share to the Units may facilitate the introduction of a new tax. With this desire to avoid too great a rigidity in the plan of allocation we agree. The particular instance of export duties requires special mention, since it is proposed in the case of the jute export duty that it should be obligatory to assign at least one-half of the proceeds to the producing units. We understand that this proposal is made largely in the interests of Bengal, which has undoubtedly suffered severely under the existing plan of allocation and the circumstances are so special as, in our opinion to justify special treatment.

Terminal
taxes.

258 Another feature in the scheme is a category of taxes (of which railway terminal taxes, if imposed would probably become by far the most important) in which the power to impose the tax is vested solely in the Federation, though the proceeds would be distributed to the Provinces, subject to the right of the Federation to impose a surcharge for federal purposes.² We can well understand that in cases where uniformity in the rate of tax, or central administration is essential, machinery of this kind may be desirable, even though no part of the proceeds is retained for the Centre.

Interest of the Provinces
in the Federal budget

259 The fact that the Federal Units either will, or may share in the yield from certain federal taxes implies that the Federal Budget cannot be the concern of the Federal Government and Legislature alone. This may result in some blurring of responsibility and from the point of view of constitutional principle is open to objection but we see no escape from it. In order to bring about mutual consultation between Federation and Units in matters of this kind, the White Paper proposes that federal legislation upon them should require the prior assent of the Governor-General to be given only after consultation with both the Federal and the Governments of the Units.³ We are doubtful whether a statutory obligation to consult the Units may not give rise to difficulties, and we see some advantage in directing the Governor-General in his Instrument of Instructions to ascertain the views of the Units by the method which appears to him best suited to the circumstances of the particular case. On the other hand a suggestion has been made for an entirely different solution of the problem and that all Central receipts which are to go in aid of provincial revenues should be paid into a special Provincial Fund to be administered for the benefit of the Provinces by the Governor-General on the advice of a statutory Inter Provincial Council representing the Provincial Governments. We are disposed to think that this would tend to undermine the independence of the Provinces, and the administration of such a fund would present serious difficulties. We prefer not to deal with the problem of distribution in this manner, and to leave the methods of consultation between Centre and the Units to be determined by convention and usage rather than by rigid statutory provisions.

White Paper Proposal 127
White Paper Proposal 132
White Paper Proposal 140

260 The entry of the States into Federation, apart from the major questions referred to above, involves some complicated financial adjustments, mainly in respect of tributes and ceded territories, but these, though of importance to individual States, do not fundamentally affect the federal finance scheme as a whole. They have been exhaustively examined in the Report of the Indian States Enquiry Committee, which was also presided over by one of our members. We do not think it necessary to review the intricate adjustments there discussed, and it is sufficient to say that we endorse the main principles on which the Report is based and in particular the gradual abolition over a period of years (corresponding to the period proposed for the assignment to the Provinces of a share of the taxes on income) of any contribution paid by a State to the Crown which is in excess of the value of the immunities which it enjoys.

261 Of the problems discussed in the Indian States Enquiry Committee's Report, the most difficult and serious is that of the maritime States in relation to sea customs. The present position, which varies between one State and another, is fully explained in the Report, and we understand that at the moment questions of importance are at issue between the Government of India and some of these States on this subject. We think it most desirable that these difficulties should have been resolved before the Federation comes into being. The general principle which we should like to see applied in the case of the maritime States which have a right to levy sea customs is that they should be allowed to retain only so much of the customs duties which they collect as is properly attributable to dutiable goods consumed in their own State, but we recognise that treaty rights may not make it possible in all cases to attain this ideal. But if insistence upon treaty or other rights in any particular case makes such an arrangement (perhaps with certain adjustments or modification) impossible, then it seems to us that the question will have to be seriously considered whether the State could properly be admitted to the Federal system. It is unnecessary to emphasize the importance of securing that there is a genuine uniformity in the rates of customs duties levied respectively at State ports and at the ports of British India.

262 Before leaving this part of the subject of federal finance, reference should be made to the arrangements proposed for the regulation and co-ordination of federal and provincial borrowing. The proposals in the White Paper on the subject seem to us acceptable, subject to one additional provision. A Provincial Government will be empowered to borrow directly from the Federal Government, or itself to raise a loan, though the latter will require the sanction of the Federal Government if the Province is already in debt to the Centre. We think that this is right, but it puts great power in the hands of the Federal Ministry, who might, by refusing the application of a Province or by insisting upon unreasonable conditions, assume the right of controlling the general policy of a Province in a manner which we do not think was contemplated. In these circumstances, it seems to us that the ultimate decision whether consent has been unreasonably withheld in any instance should rest with the Governor-General in his discretion

The additional expenditure involved by the proposed constitutional changes 20

Additional cost of Federation.

263 We have been furnished with an estimate of the new overhead charges which would result from the adoption of the Constitution proposed in the White Paper that is to say the additional expenditure required by reason (inter alia) of an increase in the size of the 25 Legislatures and electorates, or the establishment of the Federal Court. These would amount to $\frac{1}{2}$ crore (56) per annum, attributable to the establishment of Provincial Autonomy and another $\frac{1}{2}$ crore (56) per annum, attributable to the establishment of the Federation. We understand that these would be the only fresh burdens imposed 30 upon the taxpayers of India as a direct result of the constitutional changes. The amount, under present financial conditions is by no means negligible but is not of very serious dimensions. There are however apart from the new overhead charges, certain other factors affecting the financial position which it is necessary to pass in 35 review. The most important of these is the separation of Burma and although this will not in itself involve a financial loss to the taxpayers of India and of Burma considered as a whole, the revenues of India will suffer a loss estimated to be possibly as much as 3 crores (22) a year less the yield of any revenue duties on imports from 40 Burma which may be introduced from the date of separation.

Subventions to deficit Provinces
Sind.

264 The next most considerable adjustment is that due to the separation of Sind. It is estimated that there will be an initial deficit in Sind of about $\frac{1}{2}$ crore (56) a year but that this will gradually diminish and be ultimately extinguished over a period of 40

some fifteen years by the end of which time it is believed that the agricultural developments connected with the Sukkur Barrage scheme will be complete. If Sind were not constituted a separate Province this deficit would fall to be met from Bombay revenues, except for a small sum of about 10 lakhs (07) the estimated cost of new over 5 head charges (this sum is included in the total estimate of new overhead charges mentioned above). It is proposed that a subvention should be given from federal revenues to Sind, of a prescribed but gradually diminishing amount. Here again, except for the 10 lakhs already mentioned, there is no additional burden imposed 10 upon the taxpayers of India as a whole but the relief given to Bombay which is by no means unneeded will impose some additional strain on federal revenues.

Orissa

265 The subventions to other deficit Provinces also react on federal finance but we understand that the problem is one which it would 15 have been necessary to face before long under the existing Constitution, since it is clearly impossible to allow the continued accumulation of deficits by a Province if over a number of years it is beyond its power within the resources assigned to it to balance its expenditure and revenue. Special reference must be made to the 20 case of Orissa. This will undoubtedly be a deficit area and will require a subvention of something like 30 lakhs (22) a year but of this only about 15 lakhs (11) a year, which is the estimate for new overhead charges involves any additional burden on federal revenues and has already been included in the total figure for new overhead 25 charges referred to above. The balance would in effect have had

(3) THE INDIAN PUBLIC SERVICES

The Public Services under responsible government.

269 The problem of the Public Services in India and their future under a system of responsible government is one to which we have given prolonged and anxious consideration. The grant of responsible government to a British possession has indeed always been accompanied by conditions designed to protect the interests of those who have served the community under the old order and who may not desire to serve under the new but if, as we believe, the men who are now giving service to India will still be willing to put their abilities and experience at her disposal and to co-operate with those who may be called on to guide her destinies hereafter it is equally necessary that fair and just conditions should be secured to them. This does not imply any doubt or suspicion as to the treatment which they are likely to receive under the new Constitution but, since in India the whole machinery of government depends so greatly upon the efficiency and contentment of the Public Services as a whole, especially during a period of transition it is a matter in which no room should be left for doubt. It is not because he expects his house to be burned down that a prudent man insures against fire. He adopts an ordinary business precaution and his action in doing so is not to be construed as a reflection either upon his neighbours integrity or his own.

The British element in the services.

270 The United Kingdom no less than India owes an incalculable debt to those who have given of their best in the Indian Public Services, and the obligation must be honoured to the full. But the question has another and scarcely less important aspect; for we are convinced that India for a long time to come will not be able to dispense with a strong British element in the Services, and the conditions of service must be such as to attract and hold the best type of man. So long as the British element is retained Parliament in the interests of India as well as of this country may rightly require not only that the Services are given all reasonable security but that none is deterred from entering them by apprehensions as to his future prospects and career.

Present Organisation and Recruitment

The Indian Civil Services.

271 The Civil Services in India are classified in three main divisions (1) the All India Services (2) the Provincial Services and (3) the Central Services. The All India Services, though they work no less than the Provincial Services under the Provincial Government, are all appointed by the Secretary of State, and he is the final authority for the maintenance of their rights. Each All India Service is a single Service and its members are liable to serve anywhere in India but unless transferred to service under the Central Government the whole of their career lies ordinarily in the Province to which they are assigned on their first appointment.

The All India Services.

272 The All India Services consist of the Indian Civil Service the Police; the Forest Service; the Service of Engineers; the Medical Service (Civil); the Educational Service; the Agricultural Service and the Veterinary Service. Recruitment however by the Secretary of State to the Buildings and Roads Branch of the Service of Engineers to the Educational Service the Agricultural Service and the Veterinary Service ceased in 1924 on the recommendation of the Lee of the wider definition is to secure to the Services equitable and reasonable treatment in essential matters not covered specifically by statute. For example it has long been the settled policy of Government that suitable medical attendance should be available 30 to members of the Services and their families though there is nothing to that effect in the existing Act or in the rules made under it. We agree that in the circumstances something more than rights is required and we must leave it to the draftsman to decide whether "legitimate interests" is sufficient to cover the whole field which 25 we think ought to be covered.

redemption.

277 Protection against dismissal by any authority subordinate to the authority by whom he was appointed is secured to every member of the public service by the present Government of India Act and a statutory rule provides that he shall not be dismissed or 30 reduced without being given formal notice of any charge made against him and an opportunity of defending himself. Provisions on the same lines should obviously find a place in the new Constitution.¹

Indemnity for past acts

278 The White Paper proposes that there shall be a full indemnity 35 against civil and criminal proceedings in respect of all acts before the commencement of the Constitution Act done in good faith and done or purported to be done in the execution of duty.² In view of threats which have been made in certain quarters especially against the Police we think that it is justifiable to give this measure 40 of protection to men who have done no more than their duty in very difficult and trying circumstances. But we think that the certificate by the Governor General or Governor as the case may be ought to be made conclusive on the question of good faith.

White Paper Proposal 131
White Paper Proposal 130

Page 180

Officer appointed by the Secretary
of State.

379 In addition to the rights and safeguards common to all members of the Public Services it is proposed that there shall be secured to every officer appointed by the Secretary of State all service rights 5 possessed by him at the date of the commencement of the Constitution Act or a right to such compensation for the loss of any of them as the Secretary of State may consider just and equitable.¹ A list of the existing service rights are set out in Part I of Appendix VII of the White Paper. Some of them are conferred by the present Government of India Act and could only be modified or abolished 10 by an amending Act; others are embodied in statutory rules made by the Secretary of State in Council. As things stand at present the latter could no doubt be taken away or modified at any time by the same authority but the whole body of service rights from whatever source derived may properly be regarded as forming a single code which the members of the All India Services now 15 serving may equitably claim should not be varied (at least without a right of compensation) to their disadvantage and we concur with the White Paper proposal which we are glad to observe had the approval of the Services Sub-Committee of the First Round Table Conference. 20

compensation.

280 In addition to the provision for compensation for the loss of service rights it is proposed that the Secretary of State should be empowered to award compensation in any other case in which he considers it to be just and equitable that compensation should be awarded.² This is no doubt a very wide and general power; but it is impossible to foresee and provide in a statute against all the contingencies that may arise in the administration of a great Service 25 and we do not, therefore, dissent from the proposal. The Secretary of State assisted by his Advisers³ may be trusted to preserve a reasonable balance between the interests of the Services on the one hand and those of Indian revenues on the other.

281 We have examined with particular care in this connection the suggestions made to us both orally and in writing by the various Service Associations, but have come to the conclusion that no further measures of protection are required. We see no advantage, for example, in requiring the concurrence of the Governor to the personnel of the Committees of Enquiry into the conduct of officers. Nor do we consider that a case has been made out for resuming to the Secretary of State the detailed regulation for his own Services of travelling and compensatory allowances, which are, and have long been, regulated by the authorities in India. In the discharge of his special responsibility for securing the legitimate interests of the Services as a whole, the Governor would be bound to satisfy himself

³ Infra, para 362

that a Committee of Enquiry into an officer's conduct was so constituted as to ensure a fair hearing, and similarly that travelling allowances are on an adequate scale.

282 We may point out that among the conditions of service which will be secured to all serving officers appointed by the Secretary of State, if our recommendations are accepted, are the following —

Summary of more important conditions of service

(1) a right of complaint to the Governor or Governor-General against any order from an official superior affecting his conditions of service,

(2) a right to the concurrence of the Governor or Governor-General to any order of posting or to any order affecting emoluments or pensions, and any order of formal censure

(3) a right of appeal to the Secretary of State against orders passed by an authority in India—

(a) of censure or punishment,

(b) affecting disadvantageously his conditions of service, and

(c) terminating his employment before the age of superannuation,

(4) regulation of his conditions of service (including the posts to be held) by the Secretary of State, who will be assisted in his task by a body of Advisers, of whom at least one-half will have held office for at least ten years under the Crown in India,

(5) the exemption of all sums payable to him or to his dependants from the vote of either Chamber of the Legislatures

For contingencies not susceptible of statutory definition, the special responsibility of the Governor-General and Governors, and the control which the Secretary of State and his Advisers will exercise over the conditions of service of officers appointed by the Secretary of State, will in our opinion afford a sufficient, and, indeed, the only possible, protection. There is a point in every system of administration where some authority must have discretion to deal with such contingencies, and must be left to deal with them in an equitable manner.

283 The power to regulate the conditions of service of officers not appointed by the Secretary of State has already been delegated to the Government of India in the case of the Central Services and to Provincial Governments in the case of the Provincial Services but without prejudice to certain rights existing at the time of delegation. The continuance in full of these rights is secured under the White Paper Proposals.¹

Defence
Services

284 Although this chapter is mainly concerned with the Civil Services, we think it right to mention the position of members of the Defence Services as a whole, including not only the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the Defence Forces in India but also the corresponding grades of civil officials whose work lies within the sphere of Defence and who are paid from Defence estimates. They are clearly entitled to the same kind of rights and protection as they now enjoy as regards their service conditions, although the protection need not necessarily be provided in precisely the same form as that proposed for members of the Civil Services, since Defence personnel will not be affected by the constitutional changes in precisely the same way as the Civil Services are likely to be affected. Nevertheless, their rights should not be left in doubt. Their pay and pensions would be included under the head of expenditure required for the reserved Department of Defence and as such would not be submitted to the vote of the Legislature. There should be no room for misunderstanding on this point.

White Paper Proposals 191 194

Future Recruitment to the Public Services

Future
recruitment for Indian Civil Service and Indian
Police.

285 We have found the problem of the future recruitment of the two principal administrative services in India, the Indian Civil Service and the Indian Police among the most difficult of those with which we have had to deal. The appointing authority must necessarily control the main conditions of service and if control remains with the Secretary of State there will to that extent be a derogation from the powers which an autonomous Province might expect and claim to exercise over the officers who are working under it. Such a derogation is inevitable in the case of officers recruited by the Secretary of State before the establishment of the new Constitution but it was urged before us and has been again emphasised by the British India Delegation in their Joint Memorandum that future recruitment by the Secretary of State of officers who serve a Provincial Government is incompatible with Provincial Autonomy and that the All India Services ought henceforth to be organised on a provincial basis and recruited and controlled exclusively by the Provincial Governments.

Continuance of Recruitment by Secretary of State
recommended

286. We are very sensible of the logical force of this argument, and in the case of most of the All India services, we fully accept it, subject to certain qualifications to which we refer hereafter. But the functions performed by members of the Indian Civil Service and the Indian Police are so essential to the general administration of the country and the need therefore for maintaining a supply of recruits, European and Indian of the highest quality is so vital that we could not view without grave apprehension an abrupt change in the system of recruitment simultaneously with the introduction of fundamental changes in the system of government. It is of the first importance that in the early days of the new order and indeed until the course of events in the future can be more clearly foreseen, the new constitution should not be exposed to risk and hazard by a radical change in the system which has for so many generations produced men of the right calibre. All the information which we have had satisfies us that in the present circumstances only the existing system of recruitment is likely to attract the type of officer required, and we have come to the conclusion, as proposed in the 5 White Paper,¹ that recruitment by the Secretary of State both to the Indian Civil Service and the Indian Police must continue for the present, and that the control of their conditions of service must remain in his hands. We have considered, but have felt obliged to reject, the possible alternative of recruitment by the Governor-General in his 10 discretion. The change in that case might no doubt be represented as one of form rather than of substance, since the Governor-General would be acting under the directions of the Secretary of State, but we are satisfied that the psychological effect at this juncture upon potential recruits would be such as to make the suggestion quite 15 unacceptable.

287 We recognise that the recommendation which we have felt it our duty to make is one which may not be welcome to Indian opinion. We desire therefore to make it clear that it is not intended to be a permanent and final solution of this difficult question. Our aim as 20 we have already said, is to ensure that the new constitutional machinery shall not be exposed during a critical period to the risks implicit in a change of system. We observe in the White Paper a proposal that at the expiration of five years from the commencement of the Constitution Act an enquiry should be held into the 25 question of future recruitment for these two Services, the decision on the results of the enquiry (with which it is intended that the Governments in India shall be associated) resting with His Majesty's Government, subject to the approval of both Houses of Parliament.² We endorse the principle that the whole matter should be the subject 30 of a further enquiry at a later date, but past experience leads us to doubt the wisdom of fixing a definite and unalterable date for the holding of an enquiry of this kind. We agree that no useful purpose would be served by an enquiry before the expiration of five years, but we think it must be left to the Government of the day, in the 35 light of the then existing circumstances, to determine whether after that period the time has arrived for such an enquiry. It may be said that this is to postpone the final determination of the question to an indefinite future, but this is by no means our intention. We hope that the situation will have become so far clarified within five years 40 from the establishment of Provincial Autonomy that an enquiry may then be found of advantage, but where so much is difficult and perplexing it would be wrong to tie in advance the hands of those on whom the responsibility will rest for coming to a decision. Nor must it be assumed that such an enquiry will be merely a formal prelude 45 to a change of system. It will furnish the information on which an ultimate decision can be based, but we do not desire to anticipate or prejudice the final conclusion. It seems to us that the enquiry would be most conveniently made by a small body of administrative experts, who (though it is impossible at this stage to formulate any precise terms of reference) might be invited to consider (1) whether the 5 Indian Civil Service or the Indian Police, or both, should continue to be recruited on an All-India basis or be replaced in any particular Province or in all Provinces by an exclusively provincial Service, and (2) if recruitment is to continue on an All India basis by what authority shall recruitment be made and what shall be the future conditions of service.

Position should be reviewed in light of experience

The Indian
Medical Service
(Civil)

288 Under existing arrangements there is no direct recruitment for the Indian Medical Service (Civil). Vacancies are filled from among officers appointed to the Indian Medical Service who have had a period of military duty. We note the view expressed in the Report of the Services Sub-Committee of the first Round Table Conference that there should in future be no Civil Branch of the Indian Medical Service, and that the Civil Medical Service should be recruited through the Public Services Commissions. The Sub-Committee however added that the Governments and Public Services Commissions in India should bear in mind the requirements of the Army and of British officials in India and should take steps to recruit an adequate number of European doctors to their respective Medical Services and to offer such salaries as would attract a good type of recruit. We are however convinced on the information supplied to us that the continuance of the Civil Branch of the Indian Medical Service will provide the only satisfactory method of meeting the requirements of the War Reserve and of European members of the Civil Services and that it will be necessary for the Secretary of State to retain the power which he at present possesses (although medical matters have since 1920 been under the control of Ministers) to require the Provinces to employ a specified number of Indian Medical Service officers. In making these recommendations we have not been unmindful of the natural desire of the Provinces to develop Medical Services entirely under their own control. But the requirements of the Army and of the Civil Services have an overriding claim.

The Superior Railway
Services

289 The present position is that recruitment of European personnel to the Superior Railway Services is divided between the Secretary of State in Council and the High Commissioner for India. The former makes all first appointments of persons of non Asiatic domicile to the Indian Railway Service of Engineers, Transportation (Traffic) and Commercial Departments and Transportation (Power) and Mechanical Engineering Departments and the latter various specialist appointments such as Bridge Signal and Electrical Engineers, Works Managers and Medical Officers and also Engineers to fill temporary posts.

Railway Services is British, but the full effect of the corresponding ratio of Indian appointments will not be apparent for some years, as the great majority of the higher posts will continue to be filled by officers appointed to the Service before 1924. We recommend that the existing ratio of British recruitment should be continued for the present and should include a due proportion of Royal Engineer officers. We think however that the new Railway Authority should, in the future appoint British recruits. The Railway Authority will by its constitution be a strong and independent body interested solely in the efficiency of the Railways and able to secure for its personnel satisfactory conditions of service, moreover the policy of the Board in relation to recruitment will be subject to the directions of the Governor General whenever in the opinion of the latter the interests of defence or his special responsibilities are involved.

291 We approve the proposal in the White Paper that the Secretary of State should continue to make appointments to the Ecclesiastical Department.¹ Recruitment to the Political Department is indirect, vacancies being filled by transfers from the Indian Army and the Civil Service (mainly the Indian Civil Service) and, to a small extent by the promotion of subordinate political officers. The Governor-General approves transfers from the Indian Civil Service and the Indian Army; transfer from other All-India Services and promotions from the subordinate Services are approved by the Secretary of State on the recommendation of the Governor-General.

292 The Statutory Commission made no specific recommendations for the future organisation and recruitment of the Political Department of which at present the Governor-General himself holds the portfolio. Its total strength on 1st October, 1933, was 108 posts. These include on the External side the secretariat, district and judicial appointments in the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan as well as the political agencies in tribal territory, political agencies on the Persian Gulf and a proportion of consular appointments in Persia, the civil administration of Aden and such appointments as those at the Legations in Afghanistan and Nepal and the Consulate-General at Kashgar. On the Internal side they include the appointments to political agencies and residencies through which the relations of the Crown with the Indian States are conducted and the civil administration of the Chief Commissioner's Provinces of Coorg and Ajmer Merwara, and of the assigned tract of Bangalore and other British cantonment areas in the Indian States.

293 The White Paper contemplates that after the commencement of the Constitution Act, when the Governor-General assumes responsibility in his other capacity for conducting the relations of the Crown with the Indian States in matters not accepted as federal by then Rulers in their Instruments of Accession it may, for political reasons, be found desirable to make the duties of political officers in the Indian States interchangeable with those of political officers employed by the Governor-General in the Reserved Department of External Affairs. We accept the view that there is no immediate need to divide, and recruit separately, the personnel of the two Departments. Responsibility for recruitment to the political side of the Department will remain with the Secretary of State. For the time being there may be practical convenience in filling appointments in that Department by seconding officers from the Department of External Affairs, more especially as the number of posts in either Department is comparatively small and the variety of functions assigned to them makes it desirable that the field of recruitment should be a wide one. Officers of the Indian Army and Members of the Indian Civil Service appointed to the Department by the Governor-General, and other officers appointed by the Secretary of State, would enjoy the same measure of protection as we recommend should be accorded to officers appointed to the Services by the Secretary of State.

294 Since 1924 the Forests in Bombay and Burma have been administered by a responsible Minister, and under Provincial Autonomy this will in future be the case in all Provinces. We emphasise the necessity for co-ordinated research in all forestry matters, and we regard it as essential that the Central Institute at Dehra Dun for Forest Research should be maintained. But it is not only in research that co-ordination of effort between the different Provinces is and must continue to be important. Each Province should know what the other Provinces are doing in such administrative matters as the preparation and carrying out of working plans. At present this co-ordination is secured through the Inspector General of Forests with the Government of India. We think that in future co-ordination will best be secured by the creation of a Board of Forestry on which, in addition to forestry experts, representatives of the Provincial Governments would serve, and we think that the Provinces should be empowered to combine for the purpose of setting up such a Board and contributing to its expenses.

recruitment.

295 We consider that appointments of the European and Indian officers required for the higher administrative posts in the Forest Service should in future be made in India. But in the case of a small and very technical service such as the Forest Service we do not think that the best results could be obtained by separate provincial recruitment, and we recommend therefore that the Provinces should from time to time with the assistance of the Board of Forestry prepare a joint statement of their collective requirements in the matter of personnel and entrust the Federal Public Service Commission with the duty of recruitment on their behalf. The actual appointment of recruits should however be made by the Provincial Government under whom he is intended to serve since that Government will control his conditions of service. We regard it as essential to the success of recruitment that a common training centre should be maintained, and we earnestly hope that the present College at Dehra Dun will be made available for that purpose. We hope also that Provincial Governments will continue the very useful practice of lending any officers required by the Federal Government for such purposes as the staffing of the Central Institute for research and of the Training College and for forestry administration in the Andamans. We think also that the Provinces should be willing to fill higher administrative posts from the Forest Service of another Province, if a suitable candidate from their own Province is not available. In all these matters the Board of Forestry should be able to maintain effective touch between the various Provincial Governments.

The Irrigation
Service.

296 Irrigation under Provincial Autonomy will also come under the control of a responsible Minister. We emphasize in this case also the paramount need for research and co-ordination. The Royal Commission on Agriculture in India did not recommend the establishment of a central research station for reasons which we accept but they expressed a strong opinion that Provinces should devote more attention to the various problems that confront Irrigation Engineers. Unlike the Forests, there is no longer any officer with the Government of India who can give advice on Irrigation matters, although his place is to some extent taken by the present Central Board of Irrigation which we consider should be developed on lines similar to those on which we have recommended the formation of a Board of Forestry. An efficient organisation for the dissemination of information is also essential and we recommend that the existing Central Bureau of Information should be retained and developed on the lines suggested in the Royal Commission's Report.

30 297 The higher administrative posts in the Irrigation Service are at present filled by members of the Indian Service of Engineers Since 1924 on the recommendation of the Lee Commission recruitment of irrigation engineers has been in the proportion of 40 Europeans and 10 Indians for every 100 appointments, the remainder being filled by officers promoted from the Provincial Services of whom the great majority are Indians In all cases, appointments are made by the Secretary of State

298 The continued recruitment of an adequate number of highly qualified engineers, European as well as Indian, is clearly essential to the efficiency of the irrigation system, especially in the North-West of India, on which the prosperity and indeed the very existence of millions of the population depends It might well be argued that the Irrigation Service is for this comparable in importance within its own sphere to the Indian Civil Service and the Police Service and that its future recruitment and control should be in the same hands But after a close examination of the question, our conclusion is that the Irrigation Service ought to become a Provincial Service, and we are not convinced that even in the Punjab, which is perhaps the crucial case, the situation necessitates a different policy without at least first allowing the Province to prove that it can successfully recruit its own Service We are informed that there are at present 67 Europeans and 69 Indians in the Irrigation Branch of the Indian Service of Engineers in the Punjab and that, if the recruitment of Europeans now ceased, the number of Europeans would normally drop to 42 in 1939 and to 21 in 1949, that is to say, there would be for some years unless some incalculable factor intervened, such as greatly increased retirements on proportionate pension, a sufficient number of fully trained officers to fill the most essential posts, those of the three Chief Engineers and fifteen Superintending Engineers The question of irrigation is scarcely of less importance in Sind but we think that the Governor's special responsibility for the Sukkur barrage is there a sufficient safeguard We think that the Provinces should seek the assistance of the Federal Public Service Commission and the Central Board of Irrigation in matters affecting recruitment

299 Nevertheless we are of opinion that a power to resume recruitment should be reserved to the Secretary of State, if a Provincial Government unfortunately proved unable to secure a sufficient number of satisfactory recruits and it appeared that the economic position of the Province and the welfare of its inhabitants was thereby prejudiced, and provision should accordingly be made for that purpose in the Constitution Act

300 Under the White Paper proposals the Governments in India will have a free hand in regard to the recruitment for all other Services We hope that the establishment of Public Service Commissions will assist them in this most responsible task, and we endorse the observations both of the Royal Commission in 1924 and of the Statutory Commission upon the vital necessity for excluding political or personal influences We desire to emphasize also the assistance which the Federal Public Service Commission will be able to give to the Provincial Commissions in the establishment and maintenance, so far as the differing requirements and resources of the provinces may admit, of common standards of qualifications and remuneration

*Public Service Commissions*Public Service
Commissions

301 The Public Service Commissions at present existing in India are the Central Public Service Commission, established under the Government of India Act, and the Madras Service Commission established under an Act of the Madras Legislature in 1929. The legislation necessary for setting up a Public Service Commission in the Punjab has been passed but the establishment of the Commission awaits an improvement in the finances of the Province. The White Paper 45

White Paper Proposal 190

proposes the continuance of the Central Public Service Commission as a Federal organ and the setting up in each Province of a Provincial Public Service Commission.¹

functions.

302 The functions proposed for all these Commissions are advisory in character and similar to those at present performed by the Central and Madras Commissions.² We regard it as essential that each Provincial Government should be able to avail itself of the advice of a Public Service Commission. We recognise that it is not practicable to establish one Public Service Commission for all India but we should view with some apprehension the setting up of some ten Provincial Public Service Commissions in addition to the Federal Public Service Commission. We hope therefore that advantage will freely be taken of the proposed provision which we cordially endorse whereby the same Provincial Commission would be enabled to serve two or more Provinces jointly or alternatively that it should be open to a Province to make use of the services of the Federal Public Service Commission, subject to agreement with the Federal authorities. Without accepting the proposals in the White Paper for the composition and working of these Commissions in every detail we regard them as generally satisfactory.

*Payment of Emoluments and Pensions*Funds for the payment of service emoluments.

303. Before leaving this part of our Report, we propose to deal with one matter of general interest to all classes of officers by whatever authority appointed, that is to say the availability of cash for the payment of Service emoluments, and more particularly for the payment of pensions of officers appointed by the Secretary of State.

Certain
rejected.

304 It appeared from the evidence tendered by the various Service Associations that there is apprehension among the Services on this point, and we have very carefully considered whether it requires any special provision in the Constitution Act. We are clear in the first place that it would be undesirable to place officers appointed by the Secretary of State in a privileged position in respect of the provision of cash for current pay though it is to be remembered that their emoluments will not be subject to the vote of the Legislatures. Regular and punctual payment of emoluments is a legitimate interest of all persons in the Public Services, and no one class of officers can be admitted to have a prior claim in this respect. On the more general question, we have examined suggestions which have been made for a system of prior charges or for building up a reserve fund. We are informed that the percentage of the total annual revenues of a Province which would be required for the payment of all Service emoluments may be taken as approximately 40 per cent. and we are satisfied that in respect of payments which constitute so large a proportion of the total annual liabilities of a Province the suggestions are quite impracticable.

What P per Proposal 19
What P per Proposal 199 201

305 In so far as the apprehension may be that a temporary deficiency in the cash required to meet such current obligations as the issue of monthly pay might occur, not through any failure in the annual revenues, but through excessive commitments in other directions, the good sense of the Government, and the advice of a strong Finance Department, must in our opinion be relied on as the real safeguard. Nor must it be forgotten that, although a Governor will not have a special responsibility for safeguarding the financial stability and credit of the Province, it will most certainly be his duty to see that he has information furnished to him which would enable him to secure such financial provision as may be required for the discharge of his other special responsibilities, including of course his special responsibility for safeguarding the legitimate interests of the Services.

No special provision required

306 We have said that no distinction can, or ought to be, drawn between the claim of the various classes of officers serving in a Province for the due payment of their emoluments, but to this general statement of principle we think that there should be one qualification. If difficulties should unfortunately arise in regard to a claim to pension by an officer appointed by the Secretary of State who has served from time to time in different Provinces, we think that it would be unreasonable that he should have to make his claim against a number of authorities in respect of different portions of his pension. We therefore approve the proposal in the White Paper that the claims of all officers appointed by the Secretary of State for their pensions should be against the Federal Government only, the necessary adjustments being made subsequently between the Federal Government in the Province or Provinces concerned,¹ and, if that recommendation is adopted, we think that officers appointed by the Secretary of State need have no anxiety regarding the regular and punctual payment of their own pensions and those of their dependants.

Claims for pensions by officers appointed by the Secretary of State

307 There is, however, one category of pension payments which stands apart from the rest. The assets of the various Family Pension Funds have been contributed by the subscribers and are their property in a very special sense. We think it right that subscribers to these funds should be given the opportunity of saying whether they desire that a sterling fund should be created with trustees in this country out of which the necessary payments would be made.

The Anglo-Indian Community

308 We observe with satisfaction that the White Paper gives effect to a suggestion made with general agreement at the Third Round Table Conference for safeguarding Government grants-in-aid for the education of the Anglo-Indian and domiciled European community. We have inquired whether any additional provision in the Constitution Act is desirable in order to secure to a very small community, which has established a strong claim to consideration by its history and its record of public service, the maintenance of the special position in some of the Public Services, which it has won by its own efforts. We recall that the Services Sub-Committee of the First Round Table Conference recommended that special consideration should be given to the claims of this community for employment in the Services but we have come to the conclusion that it would not be in the best interests of the community itself to single it out for any special statutory protection in this respect. Provision for the due representation in the Services of minority communities is at present secured by administrative measures and not through the Government of India Act and we are informed that these measures are now being carefully reviewed in order to ensure that when the Constitution Act comes into force arrangements will be in operation adequate to protect the legitimate interests of minorities, including the Anglo-Indian community. We think that the special attention of the Governor-General and the Governors should be drawn in the Instruments of Instructions to these arrangements, and that they should be directed to maintain them without modification, except in so far as may become necessary in the interests of the minority communities themselves or of public policy.

Anglo Indian and the Services

(4) THE JUDICATURE

The Federal Court

The Federal Court.

309 A Federal Court is an essential element in a Federal Constitution. It is at once the interpreter and guardian of the Constitution and a tribunal for the determination of disputes between the constituent units of the Federation. The establishment of a Federal Court is part of the White Paper scheme, and we approve generally the proposals with regard to it.¹ We have, however certain comments to make upon them, which we set out below

The Judges of the Federal Court.

310 The Court should, we think consist of a Chief Justice and not more than six or eight Judges, the maximum number being specified in the Constitution Act, but we do not suppose that for some time to come it will be necessary to appoint more than three or four. The retiring age for Federal Judges should be 65 and not 62. We observe that the Judges are to hold office during good behaviour and not, as is at present the case with Judges of the Indian High Courts, at pleasure. We think that this is right, but we assume that it is not intended that the Legislature should have power to present an Address praying for the removal of a Federal Judge and in our opinion a Judge should not be removed for misbehaviour except on a report by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to whom His Majesty should be empowered to refer the matter for consideration. We concur generally with the qualifications proposed for the Judges but we doubt whether in principle any distinction ought to be drawn in the Constitution Act between judges advocates and pleaders of State Courts and those of the High Courts, though this does not of course mean that any obligation would be imposed upon the Crown to appoint a Judge who had not all the necessary professional qualifications. We assume that the White Paper proposals mean throughout by State Court the Court of highest jurisdiction in the State. A suggestion was made that a High Court Judge who is a member of the Civil Service ought not to be regarded as qualified. We could not agree to so invidious a distinction being drawn between one High Court Judge and another though it may well be that His Majesty may in practice see fit to appoint only such qualified persons as have had a legal training before their appointment to the High Court Bench.

311 It is proposed that the Federal Court shall have an original jurisdiction in—

jurisdiction of Federal Court.

- 40 (1) any matter involving the interpretation of the Constitution Act or the determination of any rights or obligations arising thereunder, where the parties to the dispute are (a) the Federation and either a Province or a State, or (b) two Provinces or two States, or a Province and a State

- 5 (1) any matter involving the interpretation of, or arising under, any agreement entered into after the commencement of the Constitution Act between the Federation and a Province or a State, or between two Provinces or a Province and a State, unless the agreement otherwise provides

This jurisdiction is to be an exclusive one, and in our opinion rightly so, since it would be altogether inappropriate if proceedings could be taken by one unit of the Federation against another in the Courts of either of them. But we think that the jurisdiction ought 10 to include not only the interpretation of the Constitution Act, but also the interpretation of federal laws, by which we mean any laws enacted by the Federal Legislature. It is essential that there should be some authoritative tribunal in India which can secure a uniform interpretation of federal laws throughout the whole of 15 the Federation

312 It is also proposed that the Federal Court shall have an exclusive appellate jurisdiction from any decision given by the High Court or any State Court, so far as it involves the interpretation of the Constitution Act or of any rights or obligations arising thereunder, 20 but that no appeal shall lie except with the leave of the Federal Court or of the High Court of the Province or State, or unless in a civil case the value of the subject matter in dispute exceeds a specified sum. In this case also we think that the jurisdiction ought to be extended to include the interpretation of federal laws. We had at 25 first thought on a constitutional issue appeal should lie without leave, but we appreciate that in a country where litigation is so much in favour this might result in an excessive number of unnecessary appeals. We therefore approve the proposals in the White Paper, though we think that the Federal Court ought to have a 30 summary power of disposing of appeals or applications for leave to appeal in any case where they appear to be frivolous or vexatious or brought only for the purposes of delay. It was urged before us that to permit a litigant in a State Court to apply to the Federal Court for leave to appeal, if the State Court had already refused leave,
35 would be to derogate from the sovereignty of the Ruler of the State, and that the refusal of a State Court to grant leave to appeal, at any rate in a case concerning the interpretation of federal laws, should be treated as final. We should much regret the inclusion of a provision of this kind, nor do we appreciate the argument that the 40 sovereignty of the Ruler would be affected. The appellate jurisdiction of the Federal Court, so far as regards an Indian State, can only arise from the voluntary act of the Ruler himself, viz., his accession to the Federation, the jurisdiction is in no sense imposed on him ab extra. It is, however, proposed that all appeals to the Federal 45 Court should be in the form of a Special Case to be stated by the Court appealed from, and, if it would give satisfaction to the States, it might be provided that the granting of leave to appeal by the

jurisdiction
of Federal Court

Federal Court should take the form of Letters of Request directed either to the State Court itself or to the Government of the State for transmission to the Court.

Appeals to
Council.

313. This appeal to the Privy Council is preserved and it is proposed that an appeal shall lie without leave in any matter involving the interpretation of the Constitution Act but in any other case only by leave of the Federal Court (without prejudice to the grant of special leave by His Majesty) unless the value of the subject matter in dispute exceeds a specified sum. We have no comment to make on this proposal except that we assume that the jurisdiction of the Privy Council will extend to appeals involving rights and obligations arising under the Constitution Act, as well as the interpretation of the Act itself. Effect will be given to the decisions of the Federal Court as in the case with decisions of the Privy Council by the Courts from which the appeal has been brought and all Courts within the Federation will be bound to recognise decisions of the Federal Court as binding upon themselves. We may perhaps point out that the jurisdiction of the Privy Council in relation to the States will be based upon the voluntary act of the Rulers themselves, i.e. their Instruments of Accession.

Advisory jurisdiction
of Federal Court.

314. It is proposed that the Federal Court shall have a jurisdiction similar to that possessed by the Privy Council under Section 4 of the Judicial Committee Act, 1833 which provides that His Majesty may refer to the Committee for bearing or consideration any matters whatsoever as His Majesty may think fit, and that the Committee shall thereupon hear and consider the same, and shall advise His Majesty thereon. The expression used in the White Paper is any justiciable matter which the Governor-General considers of such a nature and such public importance that it is expedient to obtain the opinion of the Court upon it. Exception was taken to the word 'justiciable', and we think perhaps that any matter of law would be preferable. We concur generally in the proposal, and we are of opinion that this advisory jurisdiction may often prove of great utility. We agree that it need not be limited to the federal sphere and that the right of referring any matter to the Court for an advisory opinion should be in the Governor-General's discretion. We understand the practice in the United Kingdom is that all such references are heard in open court and that counsel appear and argue as in an ordinary case inter partes. We assume that the same practice will be followed in India, and that there will be no question, as some of the British India delegates appeared to think, of a private and confidential opinion being communicated by the Court to the Governor-General.

45

The Supreme Court

Proposal
for future establishment of a Supreme Court.

316. The White Paper proposes that the Federal Legislature should be empowered to establish a separate Supreme Court to hear appeals from the provincial High Courts (1) in civil cases and () in criminal cases where a death sentence had been passed, provided of course that an appeal did not lie to the Federal Court. The Court would in sentence to the Provincial Government and ultimately to the Central Government or if he wishes can ask for special leave to appeal to the Privy Council. In these circumstances the rights of a condemned man seem to be very fully safeguarded and we think that no good purpose would be served by adding yet another Court to which appeals can be brought 20

The High Courts

The High Court Judges.

318 The Provincial High Courts which enjoy a deservedly high reputation throughout British India are scarcely affected by the White Paper proposals¹ but we note the following points. It has been represented to us that the retiring age of Judges should not be raised to sixty two but should continue to be sixty and we concur. We have suggested that in the case of the Federal Court the age should be sixty five because it might otherwise be difficult to secure the services of High Court Judges who have shown themselves qualified for promotion to the Federal Court; but the evidence satisfies us that in India a Judge has in general done his best work by the time that he has reached the age of sixty. We note also that the present statutory requirement that not less than one-third of the Judges of every High Court must have been called to the English, Scottish or Irish Bar and that not less than one third must be members of the Indian Civil Service is to be abrogated. We are informed that the rigidity of this rule has sometimes caused difficulty in the selection of Judges and we do not therefore dissent from the proposed amendment of the law but we are clear (and we are informed that is the general opinion of their colleagues) that the Indian Civil Service Judges are an important and valuable element in the judiciary and that their presence adds greatly to the strength of the High Courts. It has been suggested that their earlier experience tends to make them favour the Executive against the subject, but the argument does not impress us. We are satisfied that they bring to the Bench a knowledge of Indian country life and conditions which town bred barristers and pleaders may not always possess and we do not doubt that the Crown will continue to appoint them. The Indian Civil Service Judges are not at the present time eligible for appointment as Chief Justice of a High Court, though we understand that this rule does not apply in the case of Chief Courts. We see no reason for this invidious distinction, and we think that His Majesty's freedom of choice should not be thus fettered. As regards the tenure of High Court Judges we think that it should be the same as that which we have recommended for Judges of the Federal Court¹

25-

strative machinery
High Courts.

319 The administrative machinery of the High Courts is at the present time (save in the case of the Calcutta High Court) subject to the control of the Provincial Governments and Legislatures and there is evidence that the latter have from time to time tended to assert their powers in a way which might under the new Constitution affect the efficiency of the Courts. The White Paper proposes that in future any expenditure certified by the Governor after consultation with his Ministers to be required for the expenses of the High Court shall not be submitted to the vote of the Legislative Assembly though it will be open to discussion by them.² We think that in the circumstances this is a reasonable arrangement and will avoid the difficulties to which we have referred

Candidates seeking to exercise political influence should be disqualified.

322 A strict rule ought in our opinion to be adopted and enforced, though it would be clearly out of place in the Constitution Act itself that recommendations from or attempts to exercise influence by members of the Legislature in the appointment or promotion of any member of the subordinate judiciary are sufficient in themselves to disqualify a candidate, whatever his personal merits may be. We would admit no exception to this rule which has for many years past been accepted without question in the Civil Service of the United Kingdom. We do not for a moment suggest that Indian ministers will be willing to adopt any lower standards but this is a matter in which the right principle ought to be laid down at the very outset of the new constitutional order and the observations which we have thought it our duty to make may perhaps serve in the future to strengthen the hands of Ministers who find themselves exposed to improper pressure from those whose standards may not be as high as their own.

(a) The Civil Judiciary

Subordinate judges and munsiffs.

323 In the case of subordinate judges and munsiffs, the Provincial Government—that is to say, the Governor advised by the appropriate Minister, after consultation with the Public Service Commission and with the High Court—should make rules defining the standard of qualifications for candidates seeking to enter the judicial service. Candidates should be selected for appointment by the Public Service Commission in consultation with the High Court, subject to any general regulations made by the Provincial Government as to the observance of communal proportions. The Minister would be informed by the Commission of the candidate or the candidates selected by them, and the appointment would be made by the Governor on the Minister's recommendation. The Public Service Commission would of course act in an advisory capacity only, but we cannot conceive that any Minister would reject their advice or recommend an appointment without it. We think it of first importance that promotions from grade to grade or from the rank of munsiff to that of subordinate judge and also the leave and postings of munsiffs and subordinate judges, should be in the hands of the High Court, subject to the usual rights of appeal of the officer affected.

District judges.

324 In the case of District Judges or additional District Judges, first appointment should, if the candidate is a member of the Indian Civil Service, be made by the Governor on the recommendation of the Minister after consultation with the High Court. A recommendation by the Minister for the appointment of a member of the subordinate judicial service should only be made with the approval of the Public Service Commission and of the High Court. A recommendation for a direct appointment from the Bar should be made from among persons nominated by the High Court, subject to any general regulations in force regarding communal proportions. A District Judge should only be promoted (except in the case of automatic time scale promotions) on a recommendation by the Minister after consultation with the High Court and the same rule should apply to postings. In all the cases covered by this paragraph we think that the Governor should have a discretion to reject a recommendation if he does not concur with it.

(b) The Criminal Magistracy

Deputy Magistrates and tahsildars.

325 In the case of deputy magistrates, sub-deputy magistrates and tahsildars, the High Court have little knowledge of their judicial work, and none at all of the work which a large number of them

35 perform in their executive or administrative capacities. Candidates for a first appointment to these posts should be selected by the Public Service Commission, and the appointment should be made from the candidates so selected by the Governor on the recommendation of the Minister. In the case of subsequent promotions or postings, 40 the Minister should ask for the recommendations of the District Magistrate, in consultation, where necessary, with the Sessions
 Judge of the district in which the subordinate magistrate works, and we think that, if these recommendations are disregarded, some machinery should be devised for bringing the matter to the 45 notice of the Governor.

(5) COMMERCIAL AND OTHER FORMS OF DISCRIMINATION

326 The importance attached in this country to this part of the Indian constitutional problem has been both misunderstood and misrepresented. It has been misunderstood, because it was thought to 5 imply a belief that the accepted policy of Indian political leaders is to destroy or injure British commercial interests by unfair and discriminatory legislation or otherwise, and misrepresented, because it has been made the basis of a suggestion that His Majesty's Government are seeking to impose unreasonable fetters upon the future 10 Indian Legislature for the purpose of securing exceptional advantages to British, at the expense of Indian, commerce. The belief and the suggestion are equally without foundation. The Second Round Table Conference in 1931 adopted a resolution to the effect that there should be no discrimination between the rights of the 15 British mercantile community, firms and companies, trading in India, and the rights of Indian born subjects, witnesses who appeared before us spoke in the same sense, and the British-India Delegation in their Joint Memorandum state that on the question of principle there has always been a substantial measure of agreement 20 in India. On the other hand, we have been assured no less strongly by those who represent British commercial interests that they ask for no exceptional or preferential treatment, and that their policy is one of a fair field and no favour. The question therefore resolves itself to a consideration of the best method of giving practical effect 25 to the avowed policy and intentions of all concerned. It may indeed be asked why, in view of the assurances of which we have spoken, it is necessary to deal with the matter at all in the Constitution Act, and to this our answer must be that, though we hope and believe that the statutory provisions which we contemplate will in the event 30 prove to have been an excess of caution, yet there have also been statements of a very disturbing character made from time to time by influential persons in India, which could not fail to give rise to suspicions and doubts, and statutory provision by way of reassurance has for that reason become an evident necessity. Nor are the 35 doubts and suspicions thus aroused confined to trading interests in this country, for the minorities in India have expressed similar apprehensions and are anxious to have a statutory safeguard for what they conceive to be their rights.

327 Discrimination may be of two kinds, administrative or Administrative 40 legislative. We are satisfied that with regard to the first a statutory dis-prohibition would be not only impracticable but useless, for it would be impossible to regulate by any statute the exercise of its discretion by the Executive. The true safeguard against discrimination of this kind must be found in the good sense of Indian Ministers. But at the 45 same time we agree with the proposal in the White Paper¹ that the

Governor General and Governors in their respective spheres should have imposed upon them a special responsibility for the prevention of discrimination, thus enabling them, if action is proposed by their Ministers which would have discriminatory effect, to intervene, and, if necessary either to decline to accept their advice or (as the case may require) to exercise the special powers which flow from the possession of a special responsibility. But although we think that the main purpose of this special responsibility will be to counteract discriminatory action in the administrative sphere,—and indeed that it is the only available means for that purpose,—we think that its definition might be made more precise and its ambit more clear and with this object we suggest that the definition should be for the prevention of discrimination in matters in respect of which provision is made elsewhere in the Act against discrimination by legislative enactment.

The Fiscal Autonomy
Convention.

328 Before considering the scope which should be given to provisions in restraint of legislative discrimination, we think it right to observe that it is not our intention that any of the provisions which we contemplate for the purpose of preventing discrimination, whether administrative or legislative, should be so utilised as to interfere with or limit the fiscal autonomy which India has enjoyed since the acceptance of the recommendations made by the Joint Committee on the Bill of 1919 commonly called the Fiscal Autonomy Convention. At the same time, fears have been expressed lest the unrestricted operation of this Convention might result, with no remedy available, in the imposition of penal tariffs upon British goods with the object, not of furthering Indian trade but of injuring British trade, in order to put pressure upon this country for political purposes. We are satisfied that it was not in the minds of the authors of the Fiscal Autonomy Convention, and has never during the period of its operation been in the mind of His Majesty's Government, that the Convention should be invoked in aid of such a policy and we have been assured by the Indian Delegates that there would be no desire in India that unrestricted fiscal freedom should be utilised in future for a purpose so destructive of the basis of that conception of partnership upon which the whole of our recommendations proceed. In these circumstances we shall, in fact, be making no change in the existing fiscal relations between India and this country if we seek to make plain on the face of the Statute that it is not a legitimate or permissible use of Indian fiscal freedom to discriminate against British trade as such and we think it essential that on this matter there should be no ground for misapprehension in future. We therefore recommend that to the special responsibilities of the Governor-General enumerated in the White Paper there should be added a further special responsibility defined in some such terms as follows — the prevention of the subjection (otherwise than in accordance with commercial or trade agreements) of British goods imported into India from the United Kingdom to discriminatory treatment as compared with those imported from other countries.

The Governor
General's Instrument of Instructions.

329 But in making this recommendation we further recommend that the Governor General should be given clear directions in his Instrument of Instructions as to the scope of the special responsibility in question. The instructions we contemplate would indicate that this special responsibility is not intended to affect the competence of the Indian Legislature and of his Government to develop their own fiscal and economic policy that the duty imposed upon him by this provision is that of preventing imports from the United Kingdom from being singled out for specially unfavourable treatment in respect of such matters as customs duties, prohibitions or restrictions (other than measures concerned with the preservation of health) compared with the treatment accorded to imports from other countries that he should understand that it is not within his functions in this respect to attempt to limit the freedom of the Federal Government to negotiate with other countries for the securing of mutual tariff concessions and finally, that he should be enjoined that it is his duty under this special responsibility not only to prevent discriminatory action, legislative or administrative, but also action which, though not in form discriminatory, is so in fact

330 We have said that it is, in our view, impossible to attempt any precise definition, with a view to its prohibition, of administrative discrimination. Legislative discrimination, however, stands upon a different footing, and it is in our judgment possible to enact provisions against it. We do not forget that to the Statutory Commission the technical objections to any attempt to define discriminatory legislation in a constitutional instrument seemed decisive¹, but we observe that the Federal Structure Committee in their Fourth Report, which was adopted by the Second Round Table Conference, saw "no reason to doubt that an experienced parliamentary draftsman would be able to devise an adequate and workable formula, which it would not be beyond the competence of a court of law to interpret and make effective". The opinion of a body which contained so many distinguished lawyers must carry great weight, and we concur with them in thinking that the attempt should be made. We do not think that the White Paper proposals on the subject are very clear or precise, and in the paragraphs which follow we shall indicate the statutory provisions which, as it seems to us, ought to find a place in the Constitution Act

331 We think it right to make by way of preface some general observations. Firstly, we express our entire agreement with the statement of the British-Indian Delegation in their Joint Memorandum "that a friendly settlement by negotiation is by far the most appropriate and satisfactory method of dealing with this complicated matter," and we shall have certain suggestions to make later on this aspect of it. Secondly, we are of opinion that no case has been made out for extending the scope of any arrangements made in such a way as to include the relations between India and other parts of His Majesty's dominions. It is not for us to comment upon or to criticize certain aspects of Dominion policy towards Indian subjects of His Majesty, but we cannot be unaware of the strong feeling in India on this subject and India may justly claim the right to protect the interests of her own people in other lands. Lastly, we think that, so far as possible, any statutory enactment should be based upon the principle of reciprocity

332 Subject to what we say hereafter on the question of reciprocity, we are of opinion (1) that no law¹ restricting the right of entry into British India should apply to British subjects domiciled in the United Kingdom, but there should be a saving for the right of the authorities in India to exercise any statutory powers which they may possess to exclude or remove undesirable persons, whether domiciled in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and (2) that no law relating to taxation travel and residence, the holding of property,

Laws imposing certain conditions and restrictions should not apply to British subjects domiciled in the United Kingdom

the holding of public office or the carrying on of any trade, business, or profession in British India should apply to British subjects domiciled in the United Kingdom in so far as it imposes conditions or restrictions based upon domicile, residence or duration of residence 20 language, race, religion, or place of birth

incorporated in the United Kingdom
and in India

333 As regards companies, we are of opinion (1) that a company incorporated now or hereafter in the United Kingdom should when trading in India, be deemed to have complied with the provisions of any Indian law relating to the place of incorporation of 25' companies trading in India or to the domicile, residence or duration of residence, language, race, religion, descent or place of birth of the directors, shareholders, or of the agents and servants of such companies and (2) that British subjects domiciled in the United Kingdom who are directors, shareholders, servants or agents of a 30 company incorporated now or hereafter in India should be deemed to have complied with any conditions imposed by Indian law upon companies so incorporated relating to the domicile, residence or duration of residence, language, race, religion, descent or place of birth of directors, shareholders, agents or servants 33

Provisions should be on basis of reciprocity

334 There should however be reciprocity between India and the United Kingdom and accordingly if a United Kingdom law imposes in the United Kingdom upon Indian subjects of His Majesty domiciled in India or upon companies incorporated in India conditions, restrictions or requirements in respect of any of the above matters 40 from which in India British subjects domiciled in the United Kingdom and companies incorporated in the United Kingdom would otherwise be exempt, the exemption enjoyed by the latter would pro tanto cease to have effect.

Law throughout this section intended to include any regulations, bye-laws etc., having the force of law

Shipping

335 We think that separate provision should be made for the case of ships and shipping and it might be enacted that ships registered in the United Kingdom should not be subjected by law in British India to any discrimination whatsoever as regards the ship, officers or crew or her passengers or cargo to which ships registered in British India 5 would not be subjected in the United Kingdom.

Exceptions

336 We are satisfied that there would have to be certain exceptions. Thus, the statutory provisions which we have suggested ought not to affect any laws in force at the commencement of the Constitution Act, or laws which exempt from taxation persons not domiciled or 10 resident in India. We are also disposed to think that some provision ought to be made for the purpose of securing that the Executive is not unduly hampered in case of emergency and it is for consideration whether the provisions which we have suggested should find a place in the Constitution Act ought not to be subject to the power of 13 the Governor General and the Provincial Governors to declare in their discretion that a law to which those provisions would otherwise apply is necessary in the interests of the peace or tranquillity of India (or a Province, as the case may be) or any part thereof

Monies
subsidies

337 A further exception seems necessary in connection with 10 the Indian Acts, federal or provincial which authorise the payment to companies or firms of grants, subsidies or bounties out of public funds for the purpose of encouraging trade or industry in India. A Committee known as the External Capital Committee in 1925 recommended that certain conditions should be attached 23 to grants of this kind and their recommendations were adopted and have since that date been acted upon, by the Government of India. These seem to us to have been conceived in a very reasonable spirit, and we do not think that any objection could be 30 taken to them. But we think that a distinction may properly be drawn between companies already engaged at the date of the Act which authorizes the grant, in the branch of trade or industry which it is sought to encourage, and companies which engage in it subsequently, and we therefore recommend that in the 35 case of the latter it may be made a condition of eligibility for the grant that the company should be incorporated by or under Indian law, that not more than half of the directors shall be Indians, and that the company shall give such reasonable facilities for the training of Indians as the Act may prescribe. In the case of the former, the 40 reciprocal provisions which we have suggested would continue to apply, and the company should be equally eligible to participate in the grant with Indian companies.

338 The effect of our recommendations for the statutory prohibition of certain specified forms of discrimination would 45 be, of course, to lay open to challenge in the Courts as being ultra vires any legislative enactment which, having been assented to by the Governor-General or a Governor, as the case may be, is alleged to be inconsistent with these prohibitions. But it will clearly be the duty of the Governor-General and of the Governors to exercise in accordance with these statutory prohibitions their discretion in giving or withholding their 5 assent to Bills. And we think that the Instrument of Instructions should make it plain, as we have already indicated in connexion with the Governor-General's special responsibility in relation to tariffs, that it is the duty of the Governor-General and of the Governors in exercising their discretion in the matter of assent

Bills discriminatory in fact though not in form.

 10 to Bills not to feel themselves bound by the terms of the statutory prohibitions in relation to discrimination but to withhold their assent from any measure which, though not in form discriminatory, would in their judgment have a discriminatory effect. We have made, we hope, sufficiently plain the scope and the nature of the 15 discrimination which we regard it as necessary to prohibit, and we have expressed our belief that statutory prohibitions should be capable of being so framed as generally to secure what we have in view. We are conscious, however, of the difficulty of framing completely watertight prohibitions and of the scope which ingenuity
 20 may find for complying with the letter of the law in a matter of this kind while violating its spirit. It is, in our view, an essential concomitant of the stage of responsible government which our proposals are designed to secure that the discretion of the Governor-General and of the Governors in the granting or withholding of assent to all
 25 Bills of their Legislature should be free and unfettered, and in this difficult matter of discrimination in particular we should not regard this condition as fulfilled if the Governor-General and Governors found themselves strictly bound by the terms of the statutory prohibitions. We further recommend that, if in any 30 case the Governor-General or a Governor feels doubt whether a particular Bill does or does not offend against the intentions of the Constitution Act in the matter of discrimination, he should be instructed to reserve the Bill for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure.

Practice of professions

339. Our attention has been called to the question of the qualifica- 35 tions required for the practice of the different professions in India, and the suggestion has been made that persons holding United Kingdom qualifications ought to be secured a statutory right to practise in India by virtue of those qualifications. The case of medical practi- 40 tioners has features of its own and we deal with it separately in the paragraphs which follow but with regard to professional qualifications in general we are unable to accept the suggestion. No person has at the present time a right to practise his profession in India by virtue of a United Kingdom qualification, unless that qualification has been recognised as giving a title to practise (as has been done in 45 more than one instance) by some Indian law. An English barrister for example, only has the right to practise before an Indian High Court if the rules of the Court have given a right of audience to

English barristers. We can see no justification for imposing upon Indian Legislatures a statutory restriction in this respect which does not exist at the present moment, and we think that they should be free to prescribe the conditions under which the practice of professions generally in India is to be carried on. But it seems to us that the 5 vested interests of those who are practising a profession in India at the commencement of the new Constitution Act may properly be safeguarded and we think that they should have a right to continue to practise notwithstanding any future Act which may be passed by any Indian Legislature requiring Indian qualifications as a condition 10 of practice. We may however be permitted to express the hope that when the different professions in India become, as we hope they will, organised and controlled by their own governing bodies, arrangements will be freely made with the corresponding bodies in the United Kingdom for the mutual recognition in both countries of the 15 qualifications prescribed by each, or at least that mutual facilities will be given for their acquisition.

340 On the assumption that Burma will be separated from British India we think that British subjects domiciled in India ought to be accorded in Burma the same treatment which would be given in 20 India to British subjects domiciled in the United Kingdom, save as regards the right of entry into Burma on which in view of the special circumstances we shall have recommendations to make in due course.
These matters would fall to be dealt with in the separate legislation which will be required to establish the new con- 25 stitutional machinery in Burma but it will also be necessary to consider to what extent corresponding treatment should be accorded in India to British subjects domiciled in Burma, provision for which would find a place in the Indian Constitution Act and our recommendations on this matter also will be found in that part of 30 our Report which deals with Burma.

341 We have expressed our concurrence with the statement in the British Indian Joint Memorandum that a friendly settlement by negotiation is by far the most appropriate and satisfactory method of dealing with the question of discrimination. At the first Round 35 Table Conference the Report of the Minorities Sub-Committee was adopted which contained a paragraph to the effect that there should be no discrimination between the rights of the British mercantile community trading in India and the rights of Indian born subjects, and that "an appropriate convention based on reciprocity should 40 be entered into for the purpose of regulating these rights." It was given for conventional arrangements in the future.

Opportunity

suggested by some that a convention for this purpose should be negotiated forthwith and it was argued that in that event statutory provision in the new Constitution would be rendered unnecessary.

15 We have no doubt however that such a convention, designed to regulate rights under a new constitutional order, could not with propriety be made except with the new Indian Government, and that the proposal made in January 1931, was for that reason impracticable. Nevertheless, since we hold strongly that the conventional is preferable to the statutory method, and that agreement and goodwill form the most satisfactory basis for commercial relations between India and this country, we think that there should

5 be nothing in the Constitution which might close the door against a convention. We recommend accordingly that provision be made enabling His Majesty, if satisfied that a convention has been made between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the new Government of India covering the matters with which we have

10 already dealt in this part of our Report, and that the necessary legislation for implementing it has been passed by Parliament and by the Indian Legislature, should be empowered to declare by Order in Council that the statutory provisions in the Constitution Act shall not apply so long as the convention continues in force between

15 the two countries. It may be said that the practical result will be exactly the same, and this no doubt is true, but the merit of the proposal, as we see it, is that it would enable the Indian Government and Legislature, if they so desire, to substitute a voluntary agreement for a statutory enactment, and would therefore give to the

20 arrangements for the reciprocal protection of British subjects in India and the United Kingdom respectively the conventional basis which in our judgment it is most desirable that they should have

Medical Qualifications

312 The question of the mutual recognition of medical practitioners

25 in the United Kingdom and British India has unhappily become a matter of political controversy in India during the last few years, and in view of its importance to both countries, it seems desirable that we should describe shortly the present position. The Medical Act, 1886, empowers His Majesty by Order in Council to apply the 30 Act to any British possession "which in the opinion of His Majesty affords to the registered medical practitioners of the United Kingdom such privileges of practising in the said British possession as to His Majesty may seem just". The Act has been applied to British India, in view of the recognition there accorded to practitioners

35 registered in the United Kingdom, and this entitles any person who holds an Indian medical diploma recognised for the time being by the General Medical Council as "furnishing a sufficient guarantee of the possession of the requisite knowledge and skill for the efficient practice of medicine, surgery and midwifery" to be registered on

40 application in the United Kingdom medical register. The Act also provides that where the General Medical Council have refused to recognise a medical diploma for this purpose, the Privy Council, on application being made to them, may, if they think fit, after considering the application and after communication with the

45 General Medical Council, order the latter to recognise the diploma, and the Council are thereupon under a statutory obligation to do so. It will thus be seen that, though the Act is based upon the principle of reciprocity the General Medical Council is not compelled to give an automatic recognition to each and every diploma conferred in the other countries to which the Act applies but is entitled, subject to an appeal to the Privy Council to satisfy itself that any particular diploma is such as to furnish a sufficient guarantee of the possession of the requisite medical knowledge and skill. We understand that in countries where there is some central authority corresponding to the General Medical Council the Council is accustomed to consult that body for the purpose of satisfying itself that a particular diploma about which perhaps a question has been raised affords the guarantee required but where such body does not exist the Council must of course make its own inquiries. We should point out that the General Medical Council in the United Kingdom does not itself confer medical degrees. It keeps the medical register that is to say a register of medical practitioners who have passed a qualifying examination in medicine surgery and midwifery held by Universities in the United Kingdom and certain other bodies, in which a standard of proficiency satisfactory to the Council has been attained and the Council, though they do not themselves examine are thus able in effect to secure that the qualifying examinations and the standard of proficiency are adequate.

Withdrawal of recognition of Indian medical diplomas.

343 Until very recently there was no central body in India corresponding to the General Medical Council and therefore no authority with power to secure and maintain a common standard for the medical qualifications evidenced by the diplomas recognized by the various provincial Medical Councils in India. It appears that there was in consequence a considerable variation in the standards adopted by these bodies, and the Council some four years ago took the drastic step of refusing any longer to accord recognition to Indian medical diplomas as the Indian Legislature had refused to provide the money for a system of inspection which would have been acceptable to the General Medical Council pending the establishment of a system of inspection by an all India Medical Council. It is perhaps not surprising that the action of the Council caused resentment and protest. It was believed by many that political, or at least ulterior motives lay behind it but no one who is aware of the integrity and independence of the Council and its complete dissociation from every kind of political influence can doubt that it was inspired solely by a desire to promote the interests of medical education and to secure the highest standard of proficiency in those who claimed to be admitted to the United Kingdom register. On the merits of the dispute we are not of course competent to pronounce nor are we able to say whether the Council might have achieved their purpose in some way less likely to wound Indian susceptibilities but of the purity of its intentions we cannot entertain any doubt, and it is to be regretted that none of those affected though fit to avail themselves of the right of appeal to the Privy Council and to obtain a decision from a body whose impartiality could not be questioned.

Indian
Medical Council Act
1933.

344 The controversy has had at any rate, one satisfactory result for the Indian Legislature have now passed an Act known as the Indian Medical Council Act 1933 which sets up a Medical Council for the whole of British India with substantially the same functions as those of the General Medical Council in the United Kingdom. This Act sets out in the First Schedule the medical qualifications granted by medical institutions in British India, which are to be recognised for the purposes of the Act, and gives the Council power to secure by inspection and, in the last resort, by the withdrawal of 10 recognition an adequate standard of proficiency. In the Second Schedule are set out the medical qualifications granted by medical institutions outside British India which are to be recognised for the purposes of the Act, and in this list are included the registrable qualifications granted by licensing bodies in the United Kingdom,

 15 which admit to the United Kingdom medical register. These are to continue unaltered for a period of four years, but the Council are empowered to enter into negotiations with the authority in any country outside British India entrusted with the maintenance of a register of medical practitioners for the settlement of a scheme 20 for the reciprocal recognition of medical qualifications. The Governor-General is to be informed of the decisions of the Council to recognise or refuse to recognise the medical qualifications proposed by the authority abroad for recognition in British India, and he is to frame a new Schedule (to become effective four years after the commence-25 ment of the Act) which will comprise the medical qualifications thereafter to be recognised. Provision is also made enabling the Governor-General in Council after the expiration of four years to amend the Schedule and to add further qualifications, or to recognise only qualifications granted before or after a specified date. It will 30 thus be seen that the Governor-General in Council would, on the representations of the Indian Medical Council, be free to withdraw at any time after the expiration of four years the recognition in British India secured to medical practitioners on the United Kingdom medical register, though there is a saving for all medical qualifications 35 granted previously.

315 We appreciate and sympathise with the efforts of the Indian medical profession to put its house in order, and we hope that co-operation between the two Councils (for we are convinced that good will is not lacking on either side) will go far to ensure an amicable 40 and agreed solution of the present difficulty. We are of opinion that the Indian Medical Council Act, with only slight modifications, can be made the basis of a permanent and satisfactory arrangement. The references in the Act to the Governor-General in Council will in any event require modification under the new Con-
 45 stitution, and at first sight it would appear that it would be sufficient to substitute a reference to the Governor-General, i.e., the Governor-General advised by his Ministers, since this is a matter falling within the ministerial sphere. But we confess that we should find difficulty

 a basis for satisfactory arrangements in the future.

in agreeing that the Governor-General is an appropriate authority for determining whether any particular qualifications should be recognised, for this is not a matter of policy, but one which involves technical and professional considerations. We think that the true
 5 solution is to be found in an adaptation of the provisions in the United Kingdom Act which we have mentioned above, whereby any refusal by the General Medical Council to recognise a medical diploma granted abroad may be made the subject of an appeal to the Privy Council, and we suggest that if after the expiration of four years
 10 the Indian Medical Council proposes to withhold recognition of any of the United Kingdom qualifications set out in the Second Schedule to the Indian Act, an appeal should lie to the Privy Council, whose decision should be final. The Act of 1886 requires the Privy Council, before giving its decision on a refusal to recognise a diploma granted abroad to communicate with the General Medical Council, and there should be a corresponding provision that in the converse case there should be communication with the Indian Medical Council but we are disposed to think that the law should be amended so as to provide that in either case both Councils should be communicated with before the decision of the Privy Council is given. We hope that before the four years have expired, as a result of joint action between the two Councils, the General Medical Council will have seen its way to restore its recognition of Indian diplomas, and that discussions may proceed between them free from political influence or bias and with the sole object of promoting the interests of medical education in both countries.

The Indian
Medical Service.

346 There is one aspect of this question which seems to us to present special features. It is not necessary to emphasise the importance of the Indian Medical Service from the military point of view and in our opinion the members of the Service ought by virtue of the commissions which they hold to be deemed to possess all necessary statutory qualifications entitling them to practise.

Fundamental Rights

A declaration of fundamental rights impracticable.

347 The question of so-called fundamental rights, which was much discussed at the three Round Table Conferences, was brought to our notice by the British India Delegation, many members of which were anxious that the new Constitution should contain a declaration of rights of different kinds for reassuring minorities, for asserting the equality of all persons before the law and for other like purposes and we have examined more than one list of such rights which have been compiled. The Statutory Commission observe, with reference to this subject — We are aware that such provisions have been inserted in many Constitutions, notably in those of the European States formed after the war. Experience however has not shown them to be of any great practical value. Abstract declarations are useless, unless there exist the will and the means to make them effective. With these observations

Report Vol. II para 35.

we entirely agree; and a cynic might indeed find plausible arguments in the history during the last ten years of more than one country for asserting that the most effective method of ensuring the destruction of a fundamental right is to include a declaration of its existence in a constitutional instrument. But there are also strong practical arguments against the proposal, which may be put in the form of a dilemma for either the declaration of rights is of so abstract a nature that it has no legal effect of any kind, or its legal effect will be to impose an embarrassing restriction on the powers of the Legislature and to create grave risk that a large number of laws may be declared invalid by the Courts because inconsistent with one or other of the rights so declared. An examination of the lists to which we have referred shows very clearly indeed that this risk would be far from negligible. There is this further objection, that the States have made it abundantly clear that no declaration of fundamental rights is to apply in State territories; and it would be altogether anomalous if such a declaration had legal force in part only of the area of the Federation. There are however one or two legal principles which might, we think, be appropriately embodied in the Constitution, and we direct attention to them in the paragraphs which follow. There are others, not strictly of a legal kind to which perhaps His Majesty will think fit to make reference in any proclamation which He may be pleased to issue in connection with the establishment of the new order in India

- 25 318 Among the proposals in the White Paper is one which would put it beyond the power of any Legislature in British India to make laws (with certain exceptions) subjecting any British subject to any disability or discrimination in respect of a variety of specified matters, if based upon religion, descent, caste, colour or place
 30 of birth.¹ This proposal seems to us too wide and likely to fetter unduly the powers of the Indian Legislatures, and we understand that His Majesty's Government have, after consultation with the Government of India arrived at the same conclusion. We agree that some declaration of the general rights of British subjects in 35 India is required, but we think that it would be preferable to base it upon the existing section of the Government of India Act. We think that this declaration should provide that no British subject, Indian or otherwise, domiciled in India shall be disabled from holding public office or from practising any trade, profession or 10 calling by reason only of his religion, descent, caste, colour or place of birth, and it should be extended, as regards the holding of office under the Federal Government, to subjects of Indian States

- 319 We think also that the expropriation in British India of private property, except for public purposes and on payment of 15 compensation to be assessed by some independent authority, should be expressly prohibited. This would quiet doubts which have been caused in India by certain Indian utterances and would tend to strengthen the forces of law and order

(6) CONSTITUENT POWERS

- 350 The White Paper proposes (and we entirely concur) that, whatever the powers of the Indian Legislatures may be in relation to Acts of Parliament in general, they shall not extend to the enactment of any 5 law affecting the provisions of the Constitution Act, except in so far as that Act itself empowers them to do so.¹ By "Constituent Powers," therefore, we mean powers conferred by the Constitution Act upon some authority other than Parliament to vary specified provisions of the Act, whether or not such variation is required by the Act to be 10 subject to the approval of Parliament

- 351 We are satisfied that, though there are various matters in the Constitution Act which after an interval of time might in principle be left quite appropriately to modification by the Central or Provincial Legislatures, as the case may be, as subsequent experience 15 may show to be desirable, it is not practical politics here and now to attempt to confer such powers upon them. It would be necessary not merely to decide what matters could thus be dealt with, but also to devise arrangements to ensure that the various interests affected by any proposed modification were given full opportunity to express
 20 their views, and that changes which they regarded as prejudicial to themselves could not be forced upon them by an inconsiderate majority. With a Constitution necessarily so framed as to preserve so far as may be a nice balance between the conflicting interests of Federation and Provinces, of Province and Province, of minority 25 and majority, and, indeed, of minority and minority, and with so much that is unpredictable in the effects of the inter-play of these forces, it is plain that it would be a matter of extreme difficulty to devise arrangements likely to be acceptable to all those who might be affected and it would probably be found that the balance could only be preserved and existing statutory rights only guaranteed by a number of restrictions and conditions upon the exercise of the constituent powers which would make them in practice unworkable. But whether or not this can reasonably be regarded as a defect in the Constitution Act, we do not think that the question is one of immediate importance, since we should have felt bound in any event to recommend that the main provisions of the Act should remain unaltered for an appreciable period say for ten years, in order to ensure that the Constitution is not subjected at the outset to the disturbances which might follow upon hasty attempts to modify its details.

Constitutional amendment otherwise than by Act of Parliament,

352 At the same time we are satisfied that there are various matters which must be capable from the beginning of modification and adjustment by some means less cumbrous and dilatory than amending legislation in Parliament. To meet this need, we recommend that the requisite powers for ensuring elasticity where it is necessary should be placed by the Act in the hands of His Majesty's Government, but subject, nevertheless, to the control of Parliament. We may add that we could not in any case regard some of the provisions to which we think that this procedure should apply as appropriately entrusted to any authority in India for amendment or modification. The White Paper proposes that the regulation of certain matters should be prescribed in detail by His Majesty in Council after the Constitution Act is passed, and that any subsequent variations should be effected in the same manner. Orders in Council are commonly made upon the advice of Ministers without the intervention of Parliament, but there is also a well-established procedure, for which precedents are to be found in many Acts of Parliament, whereby both Houses of Parliament are enabled to consider and to approve the drafts of any proposed Orders before they are finally submitted to His Majesty and in certain cases we think that this procedure would be appropriate for the Orders in Council now under consideration.

Administrative matters.

353 The matters which under the White Paper it is proposed to be prescribed by Order in Council, fall into three categories. The first class comprises —

(a) The payments (other than salary proper which is to be fixed by the Act itself) to be made to the Governor-General and Governors on their own account and that of their personal staffs.

(b) The salaries and conditions of service of the Governor-General's Counsellors.

(c) The salaries, pensions, leave and other allowances of the Judges of the Federal Court and of the High Courts.

We see no reason why, except in the case of (c) Parliament should desire to concern itself directly with these matters, the settlement of which is in the nature of an executive function.

Matters which should be under control of Parliament.

354 But there are other matters to be prescribed* which are of an essentially different nature —

(a) the percentage of income tax which is to be assigned to the Provinces and the basis on which that assignment is to be made

(b) the sum to be returned at the outset by the Federation out of the proceeds of taxes on income which would otherwise be assigned to the Provinces,

40 (c) the basis on which the States are to contribute to Federal revenues during the operation of Federal exchange or income tax,

¹ White Paper, Paragraphs 10, 12, 13, 17

² See ibid., para. 31

³ White Paper, Paragraphs 17, 57, 106, 159, 161, 164

(d) the subventions to be made from Federal revenues to certain deficit Provinces,

5 (e) the qualifications of electors to the Provincial and Federal Legislatures, the delimitation of constituencies, the method of election of representatives of communal and other interests, the filling of casual vacancies and other ancillary matters, and

(f) the specification of the areas to be treated as Excluded and Partly Excluded, respectively

10 Some of these matters can scarcely be determined until after the Constitution Act is on the statute book, and to set out the others in the Act itself would add greatly to its length and complexity. We agree, therefore, that the method of proceeding by Order in Council, with a power to modify subsequently by the same method, is both necessary and appropriate

15 355 In the determination of all matters in this second category, we think it essential that Parliament should have a voice, and we recommend that a provision should be included in the Constitution Act requiring every Order in Council relating to them to be laid in draft before both Houses of Parliament for thirty sitting days before
 20 it is submitted to His Majesty. It would thus be open to either House to criticize the draft, if its provisions appeared objectionable, and His Majesty's Government would then have to consider whether it should not be withdrawn or revised, but we think also that His Majesty's Government should also have the power, in any case where 25 such a course seemed desirable, to submit the draft to both Houses for approval by affirmative Resolution. A procedure of this kind would, we think, enable Parliament to retain effective control over these subsidiary matters, and would secure that demands were only made upon parliamentary time when the intrinsic importance of the 30 proposals made was sufficient to justify such a course

356 We have given reasons for our conviction that a specific grant of constituent powers to authorities in India is not at the moment a practicable proposition. We think, however, that a plan whereby the new Legislatures can be associated with the modification hereafter 35 of the provisions of the Act, or of any Order in Council, relating to the composition and the size of the Legislatures or the qualifications of electors, is very desirable. It is, of course, competent for any Legislature in India to pass a Resolution advocating a constitutional change, with a request that its Resolution should be forwarded to 40 His Majesty's Government for consideration, and for this no provision in the Constitution Act would be required. But in our view it ought hereafter to be possible, under specified conditions, for a responsible Government in India, with the approval of its Legislature, to be assured that any such Resolution is actually taken into consideration 45 by His Majesty's Government and their decision upon it formally recorded. We recommend, therefore, that where an Indian Legislature

Procedure suggested

Resolutions for constitutional amendment by Indian Legislatures has passed a Resolution of this kind and has presented an Address to the Governor General or Governor as the case may be, praying that His Majesty may be pleased to communicate it to Parliament, the Resolution shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament not later than six months after its receipt, with a statement of the action to which His Majesty's Government propose to take upon it

357 But we think that this procedure should be subject to the following conditions —

(a) that the Resolution should be confined in scope to matters concerning the size and composition of, and the franchise for the 10 legislatures

(b) that the Federal Legislature should have no power to propose an alteration in the size or composition of either Chamber which would involve a variation of the proportions of the seats allotted to the States and the Provinces respectively or of the 15 relative size of the two Houses

(c) that the procedure should not come into force until the expiry of ten years—in the case of a Provincial Legislature from the inauguration of Provincial Autonomy and in the case of the Federal Legislature from the inauguration of the Federation 20

[(d) that, as a guide to His Majesty's Government and Parliament in this matter the Governor-General or Governor as the case may be, should be required, in forwarding a Resolution, to state his own views on the question of its effect upon the interests of any minority or minorities and finally 25

(e) that the Resolution should have been proposed on the motion and on the responsibility of the Federal or Provincial Ministers, as the case may be.

(7) THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND THE COUNCIL OF INDIA

358 The Secretary of State in Council is by statute a body corporate, and the powers exercisable by the corporation thus brought into existence are singular and indeed in some respects anomalous, because inconsistent with the doctrine of ministerial responsibility 5 The Council itself consists of the Secretary of State and not less than eight nor more than twelve members, of whom at least one-half must have served or resided in India for at least ten years. The members other than the Secretary of State hold office for a term of five years, but, like His Majesty's Judges and the Comptroller 10 and Auditor General may be removed from office on an address presented to the Crown by both Houses of Parliament.

359 The Secretary of State in Council has power to dispose of real or personal estate vested in the Crown, to raise money by way of mortgage, and to make, vary and discharge contracts and at the present 15 time in any suit, whether in India or elsewhere, to which the Government of India or any Local Government or any official employed by them is a party the proceedings must be in the name of the Secretary of State in Council. The Secretary of State in Council is also the only authority for raising loans in this country for the purpose of the 20 Government of India. The Council of India, under the direction of the Secretary of State is required to "conduct the business transacted in the United Kingdom in relation to the Government of India and the correspondence with India. At meetings of the Council, questions are decided by a majority vote but the Secretary of State 25 may if he thinks fit, over rule the Council, except in certain matters for the decision of which a majority of the Council present and voting is required. These matters are (1) grants or appropriations of any part of the revenues of India (2) the sale or disposal of real or personal estate and the raising of money thereon by mortgage or otherwise (3) the making of contracts, including instruments of contract of civil offices in India (4) the application to the Government of India and the local Governors of authority to perform on behalf and in the name of the Secretary of State in Council any of the obligations of the last two heads; (5) the passing of any order affecting the salaries of members of the Governor General's Council, and (6) the making of rules regulating various matters connected with the Indian Public Services.

360 The Bill which became the Act of 1858 under which the Crown and Parliament first assumed complete responsibility for the government of India originally provided that the decision of the Secretary of State should be final in all matters which had given rise to a difference of opinion in the Council of India, but the House of Commons insisted upon limiting the authority of the Secretary of Powers in relation to finance.

State over the expenditure of Indian revenues firstly, by requiring the concurrence of the Council of India to grants or appropriations of any part of those revenues and secondly, by requiring the consent of both Houses of Parliament to the defraying from Indian revenues of the cost of any military operation beyond the external frontiers of India. The purpose of these amendments appears to have been the anxiety of Parliament not to leave a Minister the unfettered disposal of the whole of the revenues of India and of the large patronage which would thereby be placed in his hands and to afford safeguards against the expenditure of Indian revenues on purposes other than those arising strictly out of the necessities of Indian government. The result has been that His Majesty's Government have never had, and have not now, the power to compel contributions from Indian revenues for Imperial purposes, if a majority of the Council of India refuse to sanction the proposal and there is reason to believe that the powers of the Council in this respect have on more than one occasion in the past enabled a Secretary of State successfully to resist pressure from his colleagues in the Government to authorize expenditure from Indian revenues which appeared to him prejudicial to the interests of the Indian taxpayer.

361 We cannot doubt that under a system of responsible government in India, the Secretary of State in Council could not continue on the present basis. It will no longer be necessary with the transfer of responsibility for finance to Indian Ministers, that there should continue to be a body in the United Kingdom with a statutory control over the decisions of the Secretary of State in financial matters, nor ought the authority of the Secretary of State to extend to estimates submitted to an Indian Legislature on the advice of Indian Ministers. But in our opinion it is still desirable that the Secretary of State should have a small body of Advisers to whom he may turn for advice on financial and service matters and on matters which concern the Political Department.

Continuance of Council of India not necessary under responsible government

362 We concur, therefore, in the proposal in the White Paper that the Secretary of State should be empowered to appoint not less than three nor more than six persons for the purpose of advising him, of whom two at least must have held office for at least ten years under the Crown in India¹. The Secretary of State will be free to seek their advice, either individually or collectively, on any matter as he may think fit, but will not be bound to do so save in one respect only. It is proposed that so long as he remains the authority charged with the control of any members of the Public Services in India, he must lay before his Advisers and obtain the concurrence of a majority of them to the draft of any rules which he proposes to make under the Constitution Act for the purpose of regulating conditions of service, 45

An advisory body proposed.

and any order which he proposes to make upon an appeal to him from any member of the service which he controls. These proposals in effect preserve to the Services the safeguards which they at present enjoy through the Council of India and we have only two suggestions to make with regard to them. We think in the first place that the service of the Advisers who are required to have held office for at least ten years under the Crown in India should not have terminated more than two years before their appointment and, secondly it seems to us reasonable in the circumstances that at least half of the Advisers should have the service qualification. 10

suits, etc.

363 The disappearance of the Secretary of State in Council as a statutory corporation will necessitate provisions in the Constitution Act transferring to the appropriate authority the Federal Government, Provincial Governments, or the Railway Authority as the case may be the rights, liabilities and obligations incurred by the Secretary of State in Council by contract or otherwise before the establishment of the new Constitution any existing rights or suit and arbitration in this country being preserved against the Secretary of State as the successor to the Secretary of State in Council in respect of these liabilities. It seems to us that provision will also have to be made for giving a juristic personality to the Federal and Provincial Governments for the purpose of enabling them in future to sue and be sued in their own names. 15 20

India Office
staff

364 The Statutory Commission expressed the opinion that if material reductions in the India Office staff should result from their recommendations, the question should be considered whether special compensation ought not to be granted to civil servants employed in the India Office for whom equivalent employment cannot be provided elsewhere since the ordinary rules regulating the compensation of retrenched civil servants did not seem appropriate in the case of officers whose careers might be terminated as a result of changes in high policy.¹ We are informed that the Secretary of State is unable at the present time to make any forecast of the volume of business which the India Office will have to transact under the new order, but that the possibility of retrenchment sooner or later is very real and involves an extraordinary risk which no one on the India Office staff could have foreseen at the date of his entry into the Civil Service and which it is not right to ask him to assume now without any prospect of compensation if he should be affected. In these circumstances we are of opinion that the power of the Secretary of State to grant compensation from Indian revenues to members of the Indian Public Services should extend to any members of the India Office staff who may be retrenched in consequence of the constitutional changes. 25 30 35 40

Expenses
of India
Office

365 We understand that at the present time the expenses of the India Office establishment are a charge on the revenues of India but that an annual grant in aid of £150,000 is made by the Treasury. This is a matter which ought, we think, to be considered in connection with future change. It seems to us that it would correspond more nearly with the constitutional position now to be established if the expenses of the India Office were included in the Civil Service Estimates of the United Kingdom, but that Indian revenues should contribute a grant in aid, in view of the functions which the Secretary of State and his Department will continue to perform on behalf of the Government in India.

(8) THE RESERVE BANK

366 We have in an earlier passage referred to the necessity of leaving no room for doubt as to the ability of India to maintain her financial stability and credit at home and abroad. This is naturally of great importance in the sphere of currency and exchange, which, besides their pervading influence on the whole economic structure of the country, may have far-reaching effect upon government finances. At present currency and exchange are the direct concern of the Government of India, but for some time it has been felt to be desirable that they should be entrusted to a central bank, which would also control the credit mechanism of the country. The economic justification for such a change becomes reinforced when constitutional changes are being made in the form of government at the Centre. We agree with the view which, we understand, has been taken throughout by His Majesty's Government that a Reserve Bank on a sure foundation and free from political influence should already have been established and in successful operation before the constitutional changes at the Centre take place. The Indian Legislature has recently passed a Reserve Bank of India Act, and we are assured that this measure should provide the Bank with a sound constitution. As regards the date of its inauguration, we understand that no definite statement can yet be made. This must of course depend to some extent on the absence of unfavourable economic developments, but we gather that there is at present no reason to anticipate that it cannot be brought into being well in advance of constitutional changes at the Centre. Reliance on the Bank to play its due part in safeguarding India's financial stability and credit clearly demands that at all events its essential features should be protected against amendments of the law which would destroy their effect for the purpose in view.

367 The White Paper proposals require the prior consent of the Governor-General at his discretion to the introduction of legislation affecting that portion of the Reserve Bank Act which regulates the powers and duties of the Bank in relation to the management of currency and exchange¹, that is to say, they do not cover the constitution of the Bank itself. We feel however that so narrow a definition leaves open the possibility of amendment to other portions of the Act which might prejudice or even destroy some of the features of the system which we would regard as essential to its proper functioning. It seems clear that the Act must be considered as a whole and we recommend that any amendment of the Reserve Bank Act or any legislation affecting the constitution and functions of the Bank, or of the coinage and currency of the Federation, should require the prior sanction of the Governor-General at his discretion. Certain of the functions vested by the Reserve Bank Act in the Governor-General in Council (of which an important example is the appointment of the Governor,

Indian Reserve Bank Act, 1934

Certain amendments of Act should require prior sanction of Governor-General

Deputy Governor and four nominated Directors of the Bank) will in future require to be vested in the Governor-General in his discretion and appropriate provision in the Constitution Act will be so needed to secure this

(9) FUTURE ADMINISTRATION OF INDIAN RAILWAYS

368 It is stated in the White Paper¹ that His Majesty's Government consider it essential that, while the Federal Government and Legislature will necessarily exercise a general control over railway policy the actual control of the administration of the State Railways in India (including those worked by Companies) should be placed by the Constitution Act in the hands of a Statutory Railway Authority so composed and with such powers as to ensure that it is in a position to perform its functions upon business principles without being subject to political interference.

369 Questions of principle and detail arising out of the proposal were considered by a very representative Committee which sat in London in June, 1933. The Report of the Committee (described as Sketch Proposals for the Future Administration of Indian Railways) has been made available to us and was published in our Records on 27th July 1933 and for convenience of reference we reproduce it as an Appendix. We consider that the scheme outlined by the Committee provides a suitable basis for the administration of the Indian Railways, subject, however to two conditions, to which we attach importance, viz. that not less than 20 three of the seven members of the proposed Authority should be appointed by the Governor General in his discretion, and that the Authority should not be constituted on a communal basis. We have also considered the question whether the statutory basis for the new Railway Authority should be provided by the Constitution Act or by Indian legislation. There would be obvious advantages in having it being at the earliest possible date a statutory Railway Authority conforming as closely as possible, both in composition and powers, with the body which will function after the establishment of the Federation, and we see no objection to the necessary steps being taken to this end in India. But even so we are clearly of opinion that the Constitution Act must lay down the governing principles upon which this important piece of administrative machinery should be based, and consequently that the provisions of the first (and any subsequent) Indian enactment on this matter should conform with those principles.

370. In our view it will be necessary to regulate under the Constitution Act the following matters —

(a) The extent of the control of the Federal Government and the Indian Legislature over the Railway Authority (paras. 1 and 2).² It will also be necessary under this head to make it clear that the Governor General's special responsibilities extend to the operations of the Railway Authority

APPENDIX (IV)

Sketch Proposals for the future Unification of Indian Railways

- 1 Subject to the control of policy by the Federal Government and the Legislature, a Railway Authority will be established and will be entrusted with the administration of railways in India (as described in paragraph 1) and will exercise its powers through an executive constituted as described in paragraph 3
- 2 The Railway Authority will consist of seven members. The Committee is divided on the question whether (a) three will be appointed by the Governor General in his discretion and four by the Governor General on the advice of the Federal Government or (b) all will be appointed by the Governor General on the advice of the Federal Government. Those members of the Committee who are members of the Central Legislature, with the exception of Mr Anklesaria, support the latter alternative. All the Hindu and Muslim members of the Central Legislature on the Committee agree that out of the seven seats on the Railway Authority two should be reserved for the Muslim community and one for the European community. Sir Phiroze Sethna, Mr Anklesaria, Sir Manubhai Mehta and the European members of the Committee, while they would welcome an authority representative of all interests and all communities so far as is compatible with efficiency, do not consider that any special provision should be made in the statute for the establishment of the Railway Authority on a communal basis. The seven members so appointed must be possessed of special knowledge¹ of commerce, industry, agriculture or finance, or have had extensive

 Mr Joshi considers that two seats on the Railway Authority should be specially reserved for representatives of Labour and the travelling public
 Mr Joshi and Dr Ahmad consider that if the Authority is to consist of a whole time Chairman and part time members, the numbers should be increased administrative experience. The President² of the Authority, who shall have the right of access to the Governor-General, will be appointed from the members by the Governor General in his discretion

- The Federal Minister responsible for Transport and Communications may at any time convene a special meeting of the Railway Authority for the purpose of discussing matters of policy or questions of public interest. At such meetings the Federal Minister will preside. The Federal Minister may by order require or authorise the Railway Authority to give effect to decisions of the Federal Government and the Legislature on matters of policy, and it shall be obligatory on the Railway Authority to give effect to such decisions

No Minister or member of the Federal Legislature or any other Legislature in India will be eligible to hold office as a member of the Authority till one³ year has elapsed since he surrendered his office or seat, nor will any person be appointed as a member of the Authority who has been a servant of the Crown in India a railway official in India or has personally held railway contracts or has been concerned in the management of companies holding such contracts within one year of his relinquishment of office or of the termination of the contract as the case may be. The Federal Minister responsible for Transport and Communications may if he so 20 fit, attend the ordinary meetings of the Authority or be represented thereat but in neither case will there be the right to vote. The members of the Authority will hold office for five years but will be eligible for re-appointments for a further term of the same length or for a shorter term. (In the case of the first appointments three will be for three years only but those members 25 will be eligible for re-appointment for a further term of three or five years)

Any member of the Authority may be removed from office by the Governor General in his discretion if, in his opinion after consultation with the Federal Government there is sufficient cause for such action.

Members shall be appointed to the Railway Authority who are prepared 30 to give their services to such an extent as may be required for the proper performance of their duties as laid down in the Statute. Their emoluments shall be such as to secure suitable men who will be prepared to devote sufficient time for the proper discharge of their duties and responsibilities and will be fixed by the Governor-General in his discretion after consultation 35 with the Federal Government the emoluments of the members of the first Railway Authority being fixed in the Statute

3 At the head of the railway executive there will be a Chief Commissioner who must possess expert knowledge of railway working and will be appointed by the Railway Authority subject to the confirmation of the Governor 40
General. A Financial Commissioner will be appointed by the Governor General on the advice of the Federal Government. He must possess extensive financial experience and have served for not less than 10 years under the Crown or have shown outstanding capacity in the conduct of the financial

Mr Joshi and Mr Banga Iyer consider that the appointment of President should be made on the advice of the Federal Government.

Mr Joshi and Mr Yamin Khan hold the view that in regard to the membership of a Legislature the year's disqualification should not apply but that any member of a Legislature appointed to the Railway Authority will (see p. 4) vacate his seat.

Mr Banga Iyer Mr Padashah Mr Joshi, Dr Ahmed and Mr Yamin Khan are of opinion that the members should be "whole time," while the other members of the Committee consider that the Committee's recommendation does not exclude the appointment of whole-time members should experience prove this to be necessary.

affairs of commercial or railway undertakings. The Railway Authority, on the recommendation of the Chief Commissioner, may appoint additional Commissioners who must be chosen for their knowledge of railway working. Except in matters relating to Finance the Chief Commissioner shall have power to overrule his colleagues. The Chief Commissioner will carry out 5
the duties from time to time delegated to him by the Railway Authority and may delegate such powers to his subordinate officers as may be approved by the Railway Authority

4 The Railway Authority will be responsible for the proper maintenance and efficient operation of the railways vested in the Crown for the purposes of administration (including those worked by Companies) all of which will remain vested in the Crown for the purposes of the Federal Government. The Railway Authority will also exercise the control over other railways in British India at present exercised by or on behalf of Government. Provision will be made for safeguarding the existing rights of Companies working 15 under contracts with the Secretary of State in Council and it will be the duty of the Railway Authority to refer to the Secretary of State any matters in dispute with the Companies which under the terms of those contracts are subject to the decision of the Secretary of State in Council or which may be referred to arbitration. It will be obligatory on the Railway Authority 20 and the Federal Government to give effect to the decision of the Secretary of State or the award of an arbitrator

5 In exercising the control vested in it, the Railway Authority will be guided by business principles, due regard being paid to the interests of 25 agriculture, industry and the general public and to Defence requirements. After meeting from receipts the necessary working expenses (including provision for maintenance, renewals, depreciation, bonus and interest on Provident Funds, interest on capital and other fixed charges, payments to Companies and Indian States under contracts or agreements) the surplus 30 will be disposed of in such manner as may be determined from time to time by the Federal Government under a scheme of apportionment running for a period of not less than five years. In the event of a dispute as to the adequacy or otherwise of the allowance to be made in respect of renewals and depreciations the Auditor General shall be the deciding authority.
 35 Pending any new scheme of apportionment the disposal of any surplus will be governed by the arrangements in force at the time the Authority is established.

6 The Railway depreciation, reserve and other funds should be utilised solely for railway purposes, and be treated as far as possible as the property
 40 of the Railway Authority. The investment of such funds and the realisation of such investments by the Railway Authority shall be subject to such conditions as the Federal Government may prescribe. A Committee might be convened in India to advise what those conditions should be.

7 Revenue estimates will be submitted annually to the Federal Govern-
 45 ment, which will in turn submit them to the Federal Legislature, but these estimates will not be subject to vote. If the revenue estimates disclose the need for a contribution from general revenues, a vote of the Legislature will, of course, be required. The programme of capital expenditure will be submitted to the Federal Government for approval by the Federal Legisla-
 50 ture. The Federal Government, may, however, empower the Railway Authority to incur capital expenditure subject to conditions to be prescribed.

8 The Railway Authority will be empowered, subject to the powers of the Governor General in the exercise of his special responsibilities, and subject to the safeguarding of the rights of all officers in the service at the 55 time of the establishment of the Railway Authority, to regulate by rules or by general or special order the classification of posts in the railway services on State-worked lines in British India, and the methods of recruitment, qualifications for appointment to the service, conditions of service, pay and allowances, Provident Fund benefits, gratuities, discipline and conduct of those services, to make such delegations as it thinks fit, in regard to appoint-5 ments and promotions, to authorities subordinate to it and to create such new appointments in the State Railway Services in British India as it may deem necessary or to make to authorities subordinate to it such delegations as it thinks fit in regard to the creation of new appointments. In its recruit-

 10 ment to the railway services the Railway Authority shall be required to give effect to any instructions that may be laid down to secure the representation of the various communities in India. In regard to the framing of rules to regulate the recruitment of the Superior Railway Services the Public Service Commission¹ shall be consulted. Any powers in regard to matters dealt with in this paragraph at present exercised by the Government of India over Company-managed railways shall in future be exercised by the Railway 15 Authority.

9 The Railway Authority will at all times furnish the Federal Government with such information as that Government may desire, and will publish an Annual Report and Annual Accounts. The Accounts of the State owned lines in British India will be certified by or on behalf of the Auditor General.

20 10 Should any question arise involving a conflict of interest between the various authorities in British India responsible for railways, waterways and roads as competitive means of transport, a Commission will be appointed by the Governor General to ascertain the views of all the interests concerned and to report, with recommendations, to the Federal Government, whose 25 decision shall be final. The Commission shall consist of one independent expert of the highest standing and experience in transport matters, with whom will be associated, at the discretion of the Governor-General, two or more assessors.

11 The Federal Government shall lay down regulations for safety on all the Indian railways and one of the Departments of the Federal Government other than that responsible for Transport and Communications shall be responsible for the enforcement of such regulations subject in the case of the Indian States, to the provisions of their respective Instruments of Accession.

In regard to the railways referred to in paragraph 4^a maxima and minima rates and fares shall be fixed by the Railway Authority subject to the control of the Federal Government. Any individual or organization having a complaint against a railway administration under the control of the Railway Authority in respect of any of the matters which may at present be referred by the Railway Department to the Railway Rates Advisory Committee may have the matter referred under such conditions as the Federal Government may prescribe to an Advisory Committee to be appointed by the Federal

Mr Joshi and Mr Padshah consider that the Public Service Commission should be consulted in regard to the recruitment of both the Superior and Subordinate Services to the extent practicable.

Sir Muhammad Yakub considers that the Public Service Commission should be utilized in making appointments as far as practicable.

Mr Mudalier and Mr Joshi hold that the restriction under this clause to railways in British India conflicts with the provisions contained in the White Paper on the subject.

Mr Banga Iyer considers that the present powers exercised by the Government of India over all railways in Indian States should be exercised by the Railway Authority under the Federal Government.

It was represented on behalf of the Indian States that separate arrangements would be required for railways owned by India, States, and accordingly no provision has been made for such railways in the scheme except to some extent under safety (paragraph 11 sub-paragraph 1) and again under arbitration (paragraph 12).

Government. Before the Federal Government passes any order on a recommendation of the Advisory Committee it shall consult the Railway Authority.

12^a Provision should be made for the reference at the request of either the Railway Authority or the Administration of a railway owned by an Indian State of disputes in certain matters such as the construction of new lines the routing and interchange of traffic and the fixation of rates to arbitration by a tribunal consisting of one nominee of each party and a chairman approved by both parties. The decision of the Committee should be final and binding on both parties. Should the parties be unable to agree on the nomination of a chairman, he shall be nominated by the Governor General in his discretion.

The arrangements should be such as not to prejudice the position of the Federal Court as the interpreter of the Constitution and Constitutional documents.

Mr Mudalier and Mr Joshi dissent from the proposals in this clause as antagonistic to the proposals in the White Paper.

(10) AUDIT AND AUDITOR-GENERAL

371 At present, Audit in India, both Central and Provincial, is carried out by a staff under the Auditor-General. He is appointed by the Secretary of State in Council, who also frames rules defining his powers and duties. In India, Accounts and Audit are carried out by a combined staff so that the Auditor-General has functions in relation to Accounts as well as to Audit. An experiment was tried in recent years in one Province of separating Accounts from Audit but was abandoned on the grounds of expense. There is at present no constitutional provision requiring the report of the Auditor General to be laid before the Legislature in India, though in fact this is done. Audit of the Accounts of the Secretary of State is carried out by the Auditor of Indian Home Accounts who, in accordance with Section 27 (1) Government of India Act, is appointed by 15 the Crown by warrant countersigned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. His report is by statute presented to Parliament. It has also been found convenient to use the services of the Home Auditor to audit expenditure by the High Commissioner.

The

The position and functions of the Auditor-General and the Home Auditor have been fully described by the Statutory Commission.¹

372 When under the future Constitution the revenues of India are vested in the Federal and Provincial Governments, and no longer in the Secretary of State in Council as at present, it will clearly be necessary to provide that the Auditor-General in India shall report to those Governments and to the Legislatures in India, instead of to the Secretary of State in Council. With the establishment of Provincial Autonomy it will also be necessary to enable a Province to conduct its own Audit and Accounts if it should desire to do so, although, both on grounds of economy and for other reasons, many advantages would be gained by the maintenance of the present system. Even if some or all of the Provinces should ultimately conduct their own Audit and Accounts, it is desirable that Accounts framed on a common basis should be available for such purposes as the consideration by the Federal Government of applications for loans from Provincial Governments or proposals for the assignment of revenues to Units of the kind mentioned in our earlier section on Federal Finance.²

373 As regards payments made by the Secretary of State in this country out of Indian revenues, these will in future be mainly on behalf of the Central Government, especially in relation to Defence. Constitutionally, they will not in general differ from those made by the High Commissioners, except that they will more often relate to Reserved Departments than will be the case with expenditure by the High Commissioner. It appears desirable that the Audit of these payments should be made by a Home Auditor on behalf of the Auditor-General in India and that the report should go through the latter to the Indian Legislature.

374 The White Paper contains no proposals relating to the Auditor-General or the Home Auditor, although it recognises that the necessary provision would have to be made.¹ Our recommendations on this subject are as follows:—

Auditor-General in India

(i) The Auditor-General in India should be appointed by the Crown, and his tenure should be similar to that of a High Court Judge, that is, during good behaviour, subject to an inquiry, and he should be removable only by the King in Council. He should not be eligible for further office under the Crown in India. His salary and general conditions of service should be prescribed by Order in Council.

(ii) His duties and powers should be prescribed in the same manner by Order in Council, but the Federal Legislature should have power to amend and apply in the future any provision subject to the prior sanction of the Government of India, in connection with the introduction of the Bill.

(iii) The core of the Audit and Accounts Department should be placed by the Federal Government in India.

votable, except in cases where individual salaries are already non votable under other provisions of the Act

(iv) Central Audit and Accounts should apply as at present 25 to the Provinces for a period of at least five years but Provinces should be empowered to take over their own Accounts or Audit as well as Accounts, on giving three years notice, the earliest date for such notice being two years after the establishment of Provincial Autonomy. The Constitution Act should 30 provide that if a Province elects to take over its own Audit the Chief Auditor of the Province shall be appointed by the Crown with tenure and conditions of service prescribed in the same way as those of the Auditor-General.

(v) The Report of the Auditor-General on the Federal 35 Accounts should be submitted to the Governor-General, who would be required to lay it before the Federal Legislature. His report on the Provincial Accounts (or the Report of the Provincial Chief Auditor if the Province had taken over Audit) should be submitted to the Governor who would be 40 required to lay it before the Provincial Legislature.

(vi) Whether a Province has taken over Accounts or Audit or not, it is essential that there should be established a uniform general form of Accounts for the Federation and for all British

White Paper Introd., para 7c.

India Provinces. Apart from this requirement, a Province which had taken over Accounts or Audit should have the same powers mutatis mutandis as the Federal Government, in relation to the duties and functions of the Auditor-General and his staff

Auditor of Indian Home Accounts

(i) Expenditure from Indian Revenues, Federal or Provincial incurred in the United Kingdom whether the disbursements are made in the High Commissioner's Office or in the Office of the Secretary of State should be audited on behalf of the Auditor 10 General in India by an Auditor of Indian Home Accounts. His report should be sent to the Auditor-General for incorporation in the Auditor-General's own report for presentation to the Indian Legislatures. In the event of a Province having its own Chief Auditor the Home Auditor would report to him 15 in relation to expenditure relating to that Province.

(ii) The Auditor of Indian Home Accounts should be under the general superintendence of the Auditor-General and subject to the general provisions mentioned above with regard to powers and duties. The Home Auditor should be appointed by the 20 Governor-General in his discretion. His salary which should be non-votable, and his conditions of service except that his tenure of office and the procedure for removing him would be the same as in the case of the Auditor-General (though the age limit might differ) would be determined by the Governor 25 General.

(iii) As regards the staff of the Home Auditor cadre and salaries should be fixed by the Governor-General in his discretion. Salaries should be votable unless in any individual case non-votable under any other provisions of the Act. The 30 Home Auditor himself should appoint and remove members of his staff. Rights of existing members of the staff of the Home Auditor including non votability of salaries should be protected.

(11) ADVOCATES-GENERAL

375 In the course of our enquiry we have been impressed by the desirability of making available to each Provincial Government the services of a Law Officer of independence and standing, who would occupy substantially the same position as that of the Advocate-General at present attached to the Governments of each of the three Presidencies of Bengal, Madras and Bombay. Section 114 of the Government of India Act enables His Majesty to appoint by warrant an Advocate-General for each of those Presidencies, but defines his functions no more explicitly than by providing that each Advocate-General may take on behalf of His Majesty such proceedings as may be taken by His Majesty's Attorney-General in England. We are informed however that in practice the functions of the Advocate-General may be briefly described as being to advise the Provincial Government on any legal problem which may be referred to him, to represent the Crown in original civil causes in the High Court to which the Crown is a party, and also in any criminal appeals in the High Court which are regarded as of special importance, while instances of his power to take such proceedings as may be taken by the Attorney-General here are his power to enter a nolle pro equi, or to grant a fiat for review of verdict, in criminal cases tried by the High Court in its original jurisdiction, and to protect public rights in such matters as public charities and public nuisances.

376 We think that it will prove under the new Constitution no less necessary that an office of this kind, with a statutory basis, should be at the disposal of all Provincial Governments than it has proved in the past in the three Presidencies, where its existence is due to the fact that in the three Presidencies the High Courts, with which the Advocate-General himself has an historical connexion, have themselves a history differing from that of the High Courts elsewhere. It is no part of our intention to suggest that the office of Advocate-General should, like that of the Law Officers here, have a political side to it, indeed, our main object is to secure for the Provincial Governments legal advice from an officer not merely well qualified to tender such advice but entirely free from the trammels of political or party associations, who would retain his appointment for a recognised period of years irrespective of the political fortunes of the Government or Governments with which he may be associated during his tenure of office. We think in particular, that the existence of such an office would prove a valuable aid to a Ministry in deciding the difficult questions which are not infrequently raised by those prosecutions which require the authority of the Government for their initiation, though we recognise that the responsibility for decisions in these matters must of necessity rest in the last resort on the Government itself. We recommend, therefore, in order to secure the objects which we have in view, that the Constitution Act should require each provincial Governor to select at his discretion and appoint an Advocate-General holding office during his pleasure, and should contain an appropriate definition of the functions of the office in the sense in which we have described them above.

377 We understand that the Governments of the Provinces to which the office of Advocate-General is not at present attached have to rely for their legal advice either upon an officer, selected usually from the cadre of District Judges, who fills the post of Legal Remembrancer, or upon the member of the legal profession appointed in each District to act as Government Pleader and Public Prosecutor 10 Our proposal for the creation of the office of Advocate-General in every province will not of course affect the necessity for retaining the existing appointments of Government Pleader and Public Prosecutor nor do we contemplate that an Advocate-General would be in administrative control of these functionaries. And, although 15 our recommendations are based on the assumption that the Provincial Government will seek the opinion of the Advocate-General on any legal question of importance on which advice is needed, there will still arise in day to day administration numerous matters of less importance which raise legal questions, for dealing with which 20

the services of a Legal Remembrancer will, we have no doubt continue to be required indeed we understand that such an officer is found necessary in the three Provinces which at present have an Advocate-General

The Federal Advocate
-General.

378 The historical association with the Government of India of 25
the High Court of Judicature at Calcutta (which, if our recommendations are accepted, will now be terminated, thus placing the High Court in the same relations with the Provincial Government as in the case of all other High Courts) accounts for the fact that the Advocate-General of Bengal acts as a Law Officer not only to the 30 Bengal Government but also to the Government of India. We think that there can be no justification for continuing this anomalous arrangement which became still more anomalous when Calcutta, the permanent home of the Advocate-General, ceased to be the headquarters of the Government of India. But it will be in our 35 opinion of the first importance that the Federal Government should have at its disposal the services of an Advocate-General of its own, and this need will be the more marked with the establishment of the Federal Court before which the Federal Government will require to be represented by an Advocate of standing and repute. 40
Here also we think it essential that the Advocate-General should hold his office on a settled tenure and should have no political associations with the Federal Ministry, and provision for his appointment (which would in this case also be made by the Governor General acting in his discretion) and functions should be on the 45 same lines as we have indicated in the case of the Provincial Advocates-General.

(12) THE HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR INDIA

The High Commissioner

379 There has been a High Commissioner for India in London since 1920. Orders in Council framed under Section 29A of the Government of India Act make provision for his appointment and duties and various agency functions on behalf of the Government of India 5 and Provincial Governments who were formerly discharged by the India Office have been transferred to him. Under the new Constitution it will be no less essential, and constitutionally even more appropriate, that there should be a High Commissioner though the White Paper does not make any reference to this subject. 10

ment should be made by Governor-General in his discretion

380 As the High Commissioner will no doubt continue to serve Provincial Governments as well as the Federal Government it seems to us appropriate that the appointment should be made by the Governor General in his discretion, though we assume that he would consult his Ministers before doing so. It may be that some of the 15
States which accede to the Federation would also find it useful to employ the agency of the High Commissioner for some purposes, and we consider that it should be open to them to do so

381 It will no doubt be necessary for the Constitution Act to make appropriate provisions on various matters connected with the High Commissioner, such as the making of contracts and the safeguarding of existing rights of members of his staff who were originally transferred, and it may well be that examination will show that it is the High Commissioner who will be the appropriate authority to assume the liability to be sued in this country in respect of obligations of a Government in India and that provision to that effect should be made in the Constitution Act

Commissioner.

(13) TRANSITORY PROVISIONS

382 We have expressed the opinion¹ that, while it is desirable, it not essential, that the same Constitution Act should make provision both for the establishment of autonomy in the Provinces and also for the establishment of the Federation, the establishment of Provincial Autonomy is likely to precede in time the inauguration of Federation. It is clear therefore that the Constitution Act should contain provisions of a transitory nature which will, on the inauguration of Provincial Autonomy, settle the constitution and powers of the Central Government and Legislature which are for the time being to co-exist with the autonomous Provinces, until such time as they can be replaced by the Federal Government and Legislature for which provision will be made in the Constitution Act

Transitory provisions necessary, if Provincial Autonomy
precedes Federation

383 This matter is dealt with very briefly in the White Paper². The scheme there contemplated is that the Constitution Act will contain provisions enabling temporary modifications to be made in the provisions relating to the Federation, so as to enable the present Indian Legislature to continue in existence, to suspend the operation of the provisions relating to the Council of Ministers to be appointed by the Governor-General, and to provide during the interim period for the administration of all Departments of the Central Government by the Governor-General, with the assistance of Counsellors responsible to himself, as though they were Reserved Departments. Examination of these proposals has led us to regard them as not in all respects appropriate for instance, one effect (which we understand was not in fact in the minds of His Majesty's Government when the proposal was framed) of treating all Departments of the Central Government as for the time being Reserved Departments within the meaning of the White Paper would be to remove from the purview of the Legislature all supply required for Central purposes and to make it non-votable. We fully accept so far as it goes the general intention stated in the White Paper as underlying these proposals, viz, that the Central Government, though necessarily deprived of much of its present range of authority in the Provinces, should for the time being be placed in substantially the same position as that occupied by the Governor-General in Council under the existing Act. But we are of opinion that the actual method proposed in the White Paper for securing this result is not the best available, and, indeed, that the purpose to be achieved is not fully stated

Proposals
in White Paper

384 We do not attempt to set out in detail the method which should be adopted to secure the object in view, since we recognise that the problem is largely one of the technicalities of draftmanship. We think it right however to indicate the general purposes which, by whatever method, ought in our opinion to be attained as the result of these transitory provisions. It is clear in the first place that it will be necessary to keep in being the existing Central Legislature, composed as at present and elected upon the existing franchise, and with the existing number of nominated members, official and non-official and in the second place, there should in our opinion be no necessity during the transitory period to alter the composition of, or the method of appointment to the existing Central Executive. But granted these two premises, it is equally clear that the establishment of Provincial Autonomy will necessitate consequential changes in the powers of both the Central Legislature and Executive which will differ but little from the changes which will result from the establishment of Federation.

Objects to

385 Provincial Autonomy as envisaged by our recommendations necessitates, no less than Federation, a statutory distribution of legislative powers between the Central and Provincial Legislatures, and a distribution which will be identical with that contemplated under Federation. Similarly Provincial Autonomy will involve, so far as the Provinces are concerned, the same statutory distribution of financial powers and resources as that contemplated under Federation. And, in order to determine questions arising between Centre and Provinces out of their legislative and financial relationships, a Federal Court will be no less necessary during the interim period than under Federation. So far as the Executive is concerned, Provincial Autonomy involves the same limitations upon the powers of the Central Executive in relation to the Provinces as will be involved for the purposes of Federation, and, in that connexion, it will be no less necessary under Provincial Autonomy than under Federation to differentiate between the functions of the Governor-General in Council (at the moment a corporate body exercising corporately with very narrow exceptions all the functions of the Central Executive) and those of the Governor-General. In other words, it will be as necessary under Provincial Autonomy as under Federation to give the Governor-General personally that control over the Governors in the exercise of their special responsibilities and of matter left by law to their discretion which is involved in our proposals relating to Provincial Autonomy and to make it clear that the power which under Federation will rest in the Governor-General acting in his discretion to give mandatory directions through the Governors to Provincial Governments, with which we have already dealt must be vested during the transitory period also in the Governor-General acting in his discretion. We consider further that the recommendation which we have made with regard to the settlement of disputes between Province and Province or between the Centre and a Province with regard to water rights should also be brought into force during the transitory period and that from the date of the inauguration of Provincial Autonomy the Governor-General should become solely responsible for the control of the relations between the Crown and the States.

Details should be draftsman.

386. Such, in our view are the purposes which any transitory provisions should be designed to secure and, as we have already indicated, we think that it should be left to the ingenuity of the draftsman to suggest to His Majesty's Government the best and most appropriate method of carrying them into effect.

PART III.

(1) INTRODUCTORY

387 The White Paper, as we have said elsewhere, does not deal The "Burma White Paper"
 5 specifically with Burma, because at the date when it was issued opinion upon the constitutional problem appeared to be still indefinite. The Secretary of State has, however, submitted to us Proposals for a scheme of constitutional reform in Burma, which are set out in a document very similar to the White Paper. This
 10 document has been printed among the Records of the Committee, and it will be convenient to refer to it hereafter as "the Burma White Paper", but the Secretary of State has made it plain that, unlike the Indian White Paper, its recommendations are not to be taken as representing the final and considered policy of His Majesty's 15 Government, but only as a first sketch of the main lines of a possible Constitution, if Burma is separated from India. Since this document was submitted to us, we have had the advantage of full discussions with the Burma Delegates, who also furnished us before and after their departure from this country with a number of memoranda on 20 the Proposals, to which we have given our close attention and which have been of great value to us. These memoranda are also printed among the Committee's Records.

388 We propose in this part of our Report to give first a short Subjects to be discussed
 25 account of Burma and of the reasons which have led us to the conclusion that it should not form part of the Indian Federation, secondly, to consider the very important question of the trade relations between India and Burma after separation, and thirdly, to set out our recommendations as to the future government of the country in the form of a commentary upon the Burma White Paper.

30 The Province of Burma

389 Burma is the largest of the Provinces which at the present Area of Province time constitute British India. It extends from the high mountainous area in latitude 28° N, where the unadministered tribal tracts of Assam and Bengal march with Tibet and China, to the mouth of 35 the Irrawaddy, latitude 16° N, and to Victoria Point, latitude 9 58° N, on the narrow Malay Peninsula, which divides the Gulf of Siam from the Bay of Bengal. Its total area is some 234,000 square miles, Madras, the next largest Province, has an area of about 142,000 square miles. The population of Burma is, however, only 40 14,500,000, which is less than the population of any other Indian Province, except Assam and the North-West Frontier Province, with areas of 49,000 and 13,000 square miles respectively.

390 The Province falls into three main geographical divisions, Physical features on the west Arakan, lying between the Bay of Bengal and the range of hills known as the Arakan Yomas, which mark the western side of the Irrawaddy basin, in the centre the Irrawaddy basin, which is 5 in many ways the heart of Burma and the true home of the Burmese people, and on the south-east the long narrow strip comprising the old province of Tenasserim, which runs down the west side of the Malay Peninsula to Victoria Point, and which with Moulmein as its capital was the nucleus of British territorial dominion in Burma.
 10 The physical characteristics of these three divisions present striking contrasts, and it is a far cry from the City of Rangoon, planned and laid out on modern lines, with a population of 400,000 and a port handling a volume of exports and imports only surpassed in India by Calcutta and Bombay to the sparsely inhabited mountain tracts where the most primitive forms of cultivation afford a precarious living to isolated tribal communities. Political consciousness ranges correspondingly from that of the European educated barrister with nationalist ambitions as eager as any to be found in the Provinces in India to the entirely negative attitude of the Wa head hunter or the tribesman of the Chin Hills, whose sole political emotion is probably an inherited antipathy for and suspicion of his cousin in the plains

Its isolation.

391 The steep and densely wooded mountains on the north and north west of Burma, where it marches with Assam, Manipur and Bengal, cut off access from India, and on the east, where its neighbours are the Chinese province of Yunnan in the north, and French Indo-China and Siam in the south, effectively prevent intercourse with adjacent countries save by a few difficult caravan routes. Between continental India and Burma intercourse is and must be wholly by sea, and Rangoon is 700 miles by sea, a forty eight hours voyage from Calcutta, and 1000 from Madras. In these circumstances it is not surprising that the influence of India upon Burma has been of the slightest, and to this we should add that, Buddhism being the prevailing religion, caste and communalism are unknown though there are certain racial cleavages, and that the women of Burma are regarded socially and politically as on an equality with men. The Burmese language is spoken by the great majority of the inhabitants, though there are numerous local dialects. Of the total population some 10 000 000 are Burmans, 1 250 000 Karens, and 1 000 000 Shans inhabiting for the most part the frontier tracts and of the non indigenous races the most numerous are Indians, who number approximately 1 000 000 history of its with Burma

392 Trading relations between the United Kingdom and Burma began in the latter part of the seventeenth century but it was not until 1824 that, in retaliation for the invasion of Manipur and Assam by Burmese forces from Arakan, British troops from India were landed in Burma and seized Rangoon and the Tenasserim Coast which by the Treaty of Yandabo in 1826 were with Arakan ceded to Great Britain. In 1852, following a series of outrages on British subjects by the Burmese Governor of Rangoon, for which no redress could be obtained from the Burmese King the second Burmese War ended with the annexation of the province of Pegu and ten years later the coastal districts of Tenasserim and Martaban, with Rangoon and Pegu were formed into a Chief Commissioner's Province. The friendly relations which had been established in 1867 with King Mindon Min came to an end with the accession in 1878 of King Thibaw who maintained himself on the throne by the ruthless massacre of all who opposed him oppressed British traders and finally entered into negotiations for alliances with European powers. In 1885 the Government of India presented the King with an ultimatum which was rejected a British force entered Mandalay without resistance the King was deposed and on 1st January 1886 Upper Burma was by Proclamation annexed to the British Crown. Many years were occupied in restoring order but gradually a regular system of administration was established and in 1897 Upper and Lower Burma were constituted as a single Lieutenant-Governorship, with a Provincial Government and a Legislative Council, which originally comprised nine nominated members (including four officials), and was gradually expanded until in 1920 it contained thirty members, two elected by the European Chamber of Commerce and the Rangoon Trades Association, and twenty-eight (including twelve officials) nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor

Attitude of the political parties to separation

393 The Declaration of 1917, which held out prospects of advance to Burma no less than to other Provinces, encouraged the growth of a vigorous Home Rule movement, and also, as an immediate objective, a strong demand that Burma should enjoy as fully as the rest of India the advance towards responsible government made possible by the reforms of 1919. A series of deputations of Burman political leaders between 1918—1920 pressed for the application to Burma without restriction or diminution of the dyarchical system of government granted to the Provinces of India by the Act of 1919. In 1921 the Secretary of State decided to recommend to Parliament the extension to Burma of the reforms inaugurated by the Act, and the recommendation was endorsed by the Standing Joint Committee of Parliament on Indian Affairs on 25th May, 1921.

394 Particular questions, such as the franchise suitable to conditions in Burma, the composition of the Legislative Council, and the subjects to be transferred to the administration of Ministers, were remitted to a Burma Reforms Committee presided over by Sir A. F. Whyte. The proceedings of the Committee were hampered by a boycott organised by the General Council of Burmese Associations and the societies affiliated to it, who demanded a much more advanced

Constitution than had been accorded to India and refused to have anything to do with dyarchy, a refusal persisted in until the autumn of 1932, but despite the boycott the Committee was able to carry through its task, and following on its Report Burma was constituted a Governor's Province in January, 1933, with a reformed Legislative Council, and a dyarchical system corresponding to that in other Provinces. There was, however, one notable difference, for in Burma the departments transferred to Ministers included from the outset the Forest Department, which in Burma is of peculiar importance, not only because of the considerable revenue derived from the forests, but also because no less than three-fifths of the total area of the Province consists of forest land.

395 The active political leaders in Burma who accepted as a first instalment the measure of self-government afforded by provincial dyarchy, did not on that account abandon their conviction that both on racial and on economic grounds it would be better for Burma to pursue her own distinct line of development at the first possible opportunity, and foresaw that such an opportunity would be likely to occur after the ten-year period prescribed in the Act of 1919. Accordingly they took their seats in the Legislative Council, and when the time came, stated their opinions freely to the Indian Statutory Commission, who reported that they had little doubt that the resolution passed unanimously by the Legislative Council during their visit to Burma in favour of separation from India was the verdict of the country as a whole. On the other hand, the party which in 1922 had boycotted the Whyte Committee and had refused to enter the Legislative Council or co-operate in a dyarchical form of government, stood aloof and tendered no evidence before the Commission. Their unhelpful tactics have tended to obscure the fact that they too seek, and have steadfastly sought, as their ultimate objective, Burma's independence of India and the development of the country on separate lines. The difference between them and what we may call the co-operating parties has, we think, been mainly one of tactics. Whereas the latter are and have been prepared to accept what is granted to the rest of India as a stepping stone to something better the non-co-operators persist in rejecting every offer made and in standing out on every occasion for the impossible, in the belief that thereby they increase the prospect of extracting from the British Government and Parliament a more liberal constitutional scheme for Burma. They took the opportunity afforded by the election campaign in 1932 (which was to give the electorate a means of expressing through their elected members their views on the question of separation) to excite a wave of feeling not so much against the idea of separation as against the Constitution for a separated Burma outlined by His Majesty's Government at the close of the Burma Round Table Conference on the ground that it, too, was, as it undoubtedly and inevitably is, dyarchical in nature. Having decided to reject the Constitution held out as a concomitant of separation, they found it difficult to distinguish this policy from opposition to separation in the abstract and describing themselves for the purpose of the election as anti-separationists, they were driven to advocating the only possible alternative, that is, inclusion in the Federation.

Both parties desire separation.

399. We have satisfied ourselves by discussion with the Delegates from Burma representing the anti-separationist parties that they have no real desire to see Burma included in an Indian Federation, and indeed they frankly admit that on their own terms they would unhesitatingly prefer separation. The policy they have adopted contemplates only the inclusion of Burma in the Indian Federation on the basis of special financial and fiscal conditions (which so far as we have been able to understand them would be inconsistent with the fundamentals of a federal system) and on the understanding that at her chosen moment Burma would be at liberty to secede. We have no hesitation in describing this policy as wholly impracticable, and we can affirm that the Delegates from India who have been associated with us have just as little hesitation in ruling it out as incompatible with the conception of Federation. Its adoption by the Burman anti-separationist leaders is to be explained we believe by the mistaken idea that if Burma, as a unit of the Indian Federation were to take part in such further advances towards full responsible self government as may be made by the Federation, she would on leaving it at the moment of her choice start off on her own separate course so much further forward in the direction of her ultimate constitutional goal. Criticism in detail of this conception of future possibilities would involve us in dangerous fields of speculation and we think it sufficient to record our opinion that, even if Burma could be permitted to enter the Indian Federation and to leave it at will it is certain that Parliament would still regard it as its function to regulate her constitutional status and her relations with other possessions of the Crown. The inference which we draw from our examination of the course pursued by the Burman anti-separationists is that in fact they desire the separation of their country from India, but are distrustful of the consequences which may follow if the step is taken now and we see no reason to dissent from the conclusion at which the Statutory Commission arrived that so far as there is public opinion in the country it is strongly in favour of separation nor do we believe that a recommendation in this sense would seriously offend Burman sentiment in any quarter

397 The question is not, however, one to be decided solely on considerations of sentiment. The Statutory Commission adduced many other most cogent grounds for the separation of the two countries—the absence of common political interests with continental 45 India, the constant and increasing divergence of economic interests, the financial inequities (as they appear in Burman eyes) which association with India inevitably entails. They were also of opinion

justified on practical grounds

that separation should take place at once. "We base our recommendation," they observed, "that separation should be effected forthwith on the practical ground that no advantage seems likely to accrue from postponement of a decision to a future date. The 5 constitutional difficulties of securing Burman participation in the Central Government of India are not prospective but actual. They will grow with every advance in the Indian Constitution and will prejudicially affect not Burma only but India itself." By the emergence into the field of practical politics of the proposal for an 10 Indian Federation these arguments are greatly reinforced. It may be some time before the Federation is actually in operation, but already there are projects directly or indirectly ancillary to it which are rapidly taking shape, and the more deeply Burma became 15 involved in these as a result of her present position as a Province of British India, the more difficult would be her disentanglement from them hereafter. We are, therefore, clearly of opinion that the separation of Burma, if it is to be effected at all, should not be postponed.

Commercial Relations between India and Burma

398 We should have no hesitation at all in endorsing the conclusion arrived at by the Statutory Commission, if it were not that grave doubts as to the material benefits likely to accrue to Burma as a result of separation have been expressed by persons well qualified to hold authoritative opinions on the complex problems involved.
 25 It may be an invidious task to balance national aspirations and sentiment against estimates of profit and loss, but we feel that it would be a sorry concession to Burman sentiment if we were to recommend separation without weighing carefully the possibility of a serious diminution, whether immediate or prospective, of material
 30 prosperity. We have alluded to the increasing divergence of economic interests to which the Statutory Commission drew attention, and further evidence of this divergence has been provided by events since the date of their Report. It is said that if Burma were separated from India she would be free to develop her own fiscal policy on 35 lines which are impossible for her while she is tied to India, and that only by separation can she secure the freedom to do so. The matter is, however, not quite so simple. Separation would undoubtedly enable Burma to evolve a fiscal policy more suited to her peculiar needs than the high tariff policy of the Government of India, 10 but it takes time to develop a policy, and still more to gather its fruits, and separation must have consequences of immediate effect, both financial and economic.

Economic effects of separation

399 An apportionment of assets and liabilities between the two Governments would have to be made, as well as of revenues and 45 charges which are now classified as central. The Statutory Commission examined the probable results of such an apportionment, and a more detailed but still incomplete investigation of this aspect of the question was made after the first Round Table Conference the results of which are embodied in the Report known as the Howard Nixon Report. The joint investigators were not able to agree as to the basis of adjustment to be adopted in respect of certain charges, and the statistics on which they worked have been substantially affected by the general economic depression, to which Burma depending almost entirely on the export of natural products, has been exposed as severely perhaps as any country in the world. But we are satisfied after examining the more recent statistics 10 furnished to us by the Government of Burma, that Burma is at any rate not likely to be any worse off in respect of net revenue as a result of separation and indeed, if economic conditions improve may gain considerably. But as regards the immediate effects on trade the position is not so clear. A very considerable trade between 15 Burma and India, averaging in value in normal times some 40 crores (or £30 million) a year has grown up in the 48 years since Burma was fully annexed to India and it has grown up on a tariff free basis the Province of Burma being within India's tariff wall. These conditions would be wholly altered by the fact of separation. 20 Burma would cease to be an economic, no less than a political part of British India, and if nothing is done to prevent it the tariff of each country would apply against the other.

tariffs on
trade.

400 We conceive that one essential provision in any Constitution that may be devised for Burma in the event of separation will be 25 that existing Indian laws shall continue to have effect in Burma after separation unless and until amended or repealed by the Burma Legislature. Some such general provision would in any event be necessary in order to provide the basis on which the administration may be carried on without interruption but if it extended to the 30 Indian Tariff Acts and the Schedules attached to them the result would be that Burma would have to levy the customs duties prescribed by these Schedules on all goods imported into Burma, including goods imported from India, which hitherto have been free from duty and similarly with India in the case of goods 35 imported from Burma. Of Burma's total exports, averaging in normal times about 53 crores (£42 millions) per annum, about 48 per cent. (or £18 millions) goes to India, representing about 14 per cent. of India's total imports. Of Burma's total imports, averaging in normal times about 33 crores (or £21 millions) per annum about 40 43 per cent. (or £9 millions) are from India, representing 5½ per cent. of India's total exports. Thus the India Burma trade constitutes nearly half of Burma's export and import trade and an appreciable portion of that of India and it is clear that the heavy duties of the Indian protective tariff might have a serious effect upon it. 45

Suggestions
for a Trade Convention.

401 We recall that the Burma Sub-Committee of the First Indian Round Table Conference, while advocating the principle of separation expressed the hope that it might be found possible to conclude a Trade Convention between India and Burma, and stressed the importance of causing as little disturbance as possible of the close trade connections which at present exist between the two countries. Detailed suggestions for such a Convention were submitted to us by the Burma Chamber of Commerce, and we have had the 5 advantage of studying memoranda on the subject furnished by the Delegates who represented that Chamber and the Burma-Indian Chamber of Commerce and who also gave oral evidence before us. Briefly, the suggestion is this: that until such time as the two new Governments are able themselves to conclude a Trade Agreement, the existing fiscal relations between India and Burma should be maintained by special statutory provision in the two Constitution Acts. This suggestion, if adopted, would leave Burma bound for the time being to impose on imports from other sources than India the duties scheduled to the existing Indian Tariff Acts. But one of the principal considerations urged in favour of the separation of Burma from the rest of India is that the heavy duties imposed by India on certain classes of manufactured goods for the protection of Indian industries are detrimental to the interests of Burma, which demand the cheap importation of such commodities as manufactured iron and steel. The Chamber of Commerce would meet this difficulty by giving liberty to both countries to alter their tariffs (which would at the outset be identical) in relation to third countries (subject to arrangements designed to prevent the import of goods on which the tariff might have been lowered into either India or Burma, as the case might be, in order to re-export to the other), with a proviso that neither country shall without the consent of the other vary existing tariff rates in respect of an agreed list of goods or commodities, that is to say, goods or commodities in respect of which either India or Burma enjoys, by virtue of the existing freedom of trade between them, a preference so valuable that any reduction of it would seriously affect the trade in that article between the two countries.

402 These proposals are at first sight attractive, but they rest on a hypothesis which we believe is not likely to be substantiated in fact. The Memorandum of the Chamber of Commerce strongly deprecates the assumption that the Government of Burma will need any additional revenue which might result from taxing the India-Burma trade. It assumes on the contrary that as the result of the financial settlement with India, Burma will gain to an annual extent sufficient, even in the present depressed conditions, to give her a small surplus with which to meet new expenditure. We are informed that the Government of Burma do not share this view, and anticipate that, even allowing for a favourable settlement, the future Government of Burma will need to raise some revenue from trade with India. But however that may be, it is obvious that whatever gain the settlement may bring to Burma, it will involve an approximately equal loss to Indian revenues, and the Government of India, we understand, have no doubt at all that they will have to look to taxes on the trade with Burma to make good some of this loss. It may be assumed therefore, that after separation it will not be possible, on the Indian side at any rate, to maintain even for a short period an India-Burma trade free of customs duties, and when one invasion of the free trade system has been made, compensating adjustments will probably be required all round.

403 A departure from complete freedom of trade need not in all cases seriously prejudice trade between India and Burma, which depends not so much on the absence of duties as on the margin of protection afforded against competing goods from other sources, and it may well be that in respect of several classes of goods exchanged by Burma and India the imposition of a light import duty would not materially affect the flow of trade. This, however, could only be ascertained by expert examination of the trade item by item and we are of opinion that the first step to be taken is that Burma and India should agree on a list of goods on which duties could safely be imposed up to a prescribed limit sufficient to secure the India Burma trade against dislocation. It would also be necessary to deal with the question of substituting equivalent import duties for the 20 excise duties at present imposed in India on Burma products, and vice versa. To secure its object, such an agreement would have to be operative from the moment of separation, and it must therefore have been concluded before the new Governments are established, i.e. between the existing Governments. But an agreement by the 25 existing Governments can only be made binding on the Governments to be established by the new Constitution Acts by statutory provision in both Acts.

Burma may desire to reduce existing high tariffs on certain goods.

404. Though the primary purpose of any agreement imposed upon the new Governments of India and Burma by the Constitution 30
Acts would be the regulation of India Burma trade with the minimum disturbance of its existing conditions, this cannot be achieved in isolation. The imposition of duties on goods previously exchanged between India and Burma on a no-duty basis may affect the questions of the duties properly leviable by either country on competing 35 goods from other sources. Moreover Burma may desire to reduce the high protective duties at present imposed by the Indian tariff on certain manufactured goods imported from outside. This is recognised by the Burma Chamber of Commerce, and their representative in his supplementary memorandum, makes specific suggestions for 40 dealing with the case and also with the question of re-export from the country of the lower tariff to the other country. The agreement should therefore, contain as its secondary purpose provisions enabling either country to vary its tariffs on goods from outside sources but within prescribed limits, so as not to defeat the primary 45 purpose for which it is made.

Period

Trade Convention should force.

405. An agreement of this kind embodied in the Constitution Act, even though mutually advantageous to the two countries, must necessarily constitute to some extent an encroachment upon the fiscal liberty which Burma after separation is to enjoy and which India already enjoys. The encroachment would be less, if the 5 agreement provided full opportunity to both parties to vary details by mutual consent during its currency, but it is in any event desirable that the agreement itself should continue for the shortest period which is compatible with the securing to those concerned in the India Burma trade of a reasonable measure of certainty as to the 10 immediate future. One possible course would be to impose the agreement for an undefined period subject to denunciation by either country at reasonable notice, say twelve months. If the agreement proved to be congenial to the needs of both, such an arrangement might promise the greatest prospect of stability but there is a risk 15 that national amour propre might lead one or both of the new Governments to denounce it as soon as it had the power to do so, with the result that the agreement might last for little more than the period of notice. Another course, advocated by the Burma Chamber of Commerce, would be to enact that the agreement should 20 continue until replaced by another concluded between the two new Governments. This however would give one Government, if it found that it enjoyed an advantage at the expense of the other the option of retaining that advantage indefinitely; nor do we think that it would be fair to impose upon the future Government of Burma 25 in the period immediately following separation the heavy burden of negotiating an intricate Trade Agreement. In our opinion, it would be best that the agreement should last for a definite period of one or more years, either Government having the right thereafter to give twelve months' notice to determine it, and that it should contain provisions for the mutual adjustment of details from time to time during its currency, where both parties desired such adjustments to be made.

406 We recommend, therefore, that the Governor-General of India and the Governor of Burma shall be respectively empowered in their discretion (i) to apply for a prescribed period to the exchange of goods and commodities between India and Burma a scale of customs duties which shall have been mutually agreed between the existing Governments of India and Burma, or determined by His Majesty's Government in default of agreement, the scale not to be susceptible of variation during the prescribed period except by mutual consent, and (ii) to apply to specified classes of goods and commodities imported into either country from outside sources such variations of the duties imposed by the Indian Tariff Schedules at the date of separation as may have been mutually agreed by the existing Governments of India and Burma before separation, or determined by His Majesty's Government in default of agreement, or as may be mutually agreed thereafter by the two Governments during the prescribed period.

Statutory provisions recommended

407 The negotiations for a Trade Agreement might also be extended to the regulation of the immigration of Indian labour into Burma for the first few years after separation. We allude elsewhere in our Report to the desirability of withholding from Indian-British subjects the unrestricted right of entry into Burma after the separation, in order that the Government and Legislature of Burma may be free to regulate the influx of cheap labour in competition with the indigenous sources of supply. The problem is already acute, as the Royal Commission on Labour in India have recorded, and we endorse the opinion expressed by that Commission that the best way of solving the problem is by mutual agreement between the two Governments concerned. But the period immediately after separation is evidently not the most suitable opportunity for negotiating an agreement on a matter which is peculiarly capable of provoking lively animosities, and we are of opinion that, whether or not in direct connection with an agreement to regulate trade relations, at any rate at the same time, an agreement to control the influx of Indian labour into Burma should be concluded between the existing Governments. Such an agreement, which might conceivably run for the same period, and be determinable on the same notice, as the Trade Agreement (though this is a point on which we wish to make no definite recommendation), would also need to be given statutory force by the two Constitution Acts, so as to be effectively binding on the new Governments for the period of its validity.

Immigration of Indian labour.

408 The difficulty of regulating the economic relations of India and Burma in the period immediately following separation has presented itself to us as the most serious obstacle to a recommendation in favour of separation, which on all other grounds seems plainly to be indicated. We were much impressed by the views of the Delegates representing commercial interests, both European and Indian, on the disturbance of India-Burma trade which might result from separation. We believe, however, that an agreement such as we have suggested would enable both countries to tide over the Conclusions.

critical period and in these circumstances we regard ourselves as justified in recommending that the separation of Burma from India should be effected simultaneously with the introduction of the constitutional changes which we have recommended in the case of the other Provinces of India.

(2) THE BURMA WHITE PAPER

The Government of Burma a unitary
government

400 Before considering in detail the proposals in the Burma White Paper, we have certain preliminary observations to make. It is in the first place evident that a new Constitution for Burma, whatever may be its precise form, must differ in many respects from that which we have recommended in the case of the Governors Provinces in India. The Government of Burma will be a unitary 45 government, and therefore no question of any distribution of executive or legislative powers will arise since the Government will unite in itself all the powers which in a Federated India will be divided between the Federal and Provincial Governments.

The Karen
States

410. Next we desire to draw attention to some of the legal consequences of separation. On the Indo-Siamese frontier of Burma lies the territory known as the Karen States, whose independence was guaranteed by a treaty with the former Burmese Kingdom in 186. These States are not a part of British India, but are nevertheless part of India as defined by the Interpretation Act, 1889 because under the suzerainty of the Crown exercised through the Governor-General. They are under the direct control of the Government of Burma, jurisdiction in them being exercised by the Governor on behalf of the Governor-General by virtue of powers delegated under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act but their constitutional position seems to differ in no respect from that of Indian States in which the Crown exercises jurisdiction by treaty usage or otherwise. The jurisdiction therefore which is at present exercised by the Crown through the Governor-General of India, and through the Governor of Burma by virtue of the powers delegated to him, will have to be resumed into the hands of the Crown and thereafter exercised directly through the Governor of Burma, without the intervention of the Governor-General of India. The Burma White Paper rightly proposes that the first of these objects shall be secured by the Constitution Act itself for the second a new Foreign Jurisdiction Order in Council will clearly be required. 10 25

Application of Acts of Parliament extending to His Majesty's Possessions outside British
India

411. We assume that provision will be made for the continued application to Burma after the separation from India of all Acts of the Imperial Parliament which extend at the present time to Burma as a part of British India. But there are a number of other Acts of Parliament which apply to His Majesty's overseas possessions exclusive of British India and when Burma ceases to be a part of British India, it would seem that those Acts would in the absence of provision to the contrary, apply to Burma as they apply elsewhere. Thus all Acts which are declared to extend to colonies would at once become part of the law of Burma, since colony is defined in the Interpretation Act, 1889 as any part of His Majesty's dominions exclusive of the British Islands and of British India. Our attention has been drawn in this connection to the Colonial Laws Validity Act 1903 some of the provisions of which appear to be quite inconsistent with any Constitution which we could contemplate for Burma. We think that special provisions will be required in the Constitution Act to deal with this point and we agree also with the Secretary of State that no room should be left for 45 any suggestion that the new status of Burma will be assimilated to that of a Crown Colony. Apart from this, it will obviously be necessary to make provision for the continued application to Burma

of existing British Indian laws, until repealed or amended by the Burmese Legislature or other competent authority, but there will have to be some machinery for adapting those laws to meet the new constitutional situation, as, for example, by substituting the 5 Governor of Burma for the Governor-General in Council, where the latter expression occurs in an existing Act.

112 It is proposed that the Constitution Act should declare that all rights and obligations under international Treaties, Conventions or Agreements which before the commencement of the Act were 10 binding upon Burma as part of British India shall continue to be binding upon her.¹ A similar provision is to be found in section 148(1) of the South Africa Act, 1909, the Act which constituted the Union of South Africa. In that case, however, the States or Provinces by or on whose behalf the Treaties, Conventions or Agreements had been 15 made became part of a new and larger organism, which necessarily assumed responsibility for all the existing obligations of its constituent members, but we are not clear that the case of a State which becomes autonomous by separation from a larger State is precisely analogous, at any rate so far as rights as distinguished from obliga-20 tions are concerned, and we are disposed to think that the matter may require some further examination.

413 We should mention here that the Delegates from Burma, both in a Joint Memorandum signed by several of them and orally before us, expressed the hope that His Majesty might be pleased to adopt 25 the title of King-Emperor of Burma. It would not be proper for us to express any opinion on this suggestion until His Majesty's pleasure had been taken, but we may perhaps be permitted to make the following observations. His Majesty's full style and title is "George V by the Grace of God of Great Britain, Ireland, and of the British 30 Dominions beyond the Seas King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India", and Section 1 of the Government of India Act therefore correctly describes the territories for the time being vested in His Majesty in India as governed "by and in the name of His Majesty the King, Emperor of India". From this it is clear that, though it is 35 not incorrect to speak of His Majesty in relation to His Indian Empire as "The King-Emperor," the expression "King-Emperor of India" is not legally a part of His Majesty's style and title.
 Hence a reference to Burma in the Royal Title could, subject to His Majesty's consent, only be introduced by legislation, which, since the 40 Statute of Westminster became law, would require the concurrence of the Dominion Governments. The Delegates also desired that the Governor should in future be known as the Governor-General of Burma, but this too is a matter on which we think that His Majesty's pleasure would have to be taken.

The Executive

414 The proposals in the Burma White Paper with regard to the Executive follow generally those in the India White Paper with regard to the Executive Government of the Federation and of the 5 Provinces, that is to say, executive power and authority is to be

The Executive
Government

vested in the Governor as the representative of the King aided and advised by a Council of Ministers.¹ We approve these proposals in principle, and it is not necessary to repeat what we have already said on the subject in the earlier part of our Report but there are certain divergencies between the India and Burma White Papers to 10 which we should draw attention, as well as other points which arise only in the case of Burma.

Law and Order

416. The Council of Ministers will have a constitutional right to tender advice to the Governor in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution Act, other than powers connected with 15 certain Departments which will be reserved for the Governor's own direction and control and matters left by the Constitution Act to the Governor's own discretion but the Governor will be declared to have a special responsibility in respect of certain matters and where they are involved will be free to act according to his own 20 judgment. The matters which it is proposed shall be reserved to the Governor's own direction and control are Defence, External Affairs Ecclesiastical Affairs, the affairs of certain Excluded Areas, and monetary policy currency and coinage. With these we deal later but we point out that they do not include law and order, 25 which will, therefore, fall within the ministerial sphere as it will in the Indian Provinces, if our recommendations are accepted. We are of opinion that the responsibility for law and order ought in future to rest on Ministers in Burma no less than in India, and for substantially the same reasons. From one point of view the problem 30 is less difficult in Burma, because of the absence of communal feeling but on the other hand, serious crime especially crimes of violence, appears to be more rife in Burma than in India. In proportion to population the percentage of murders, dacoities and cattle thefts exceeds (and often greatly exceeds) the percentage in almost every 35 other Province of British India, though there is a marked absence of that form of crime known as terrorism. Nevertheless, though the need for an efficient and disciplined police force in Burma is manifest, we do not think that Burma should be deprived of the opportunity which in our judgment ought to be afforded to the 40 Indian Provinces in this sphere.

The Burma
Police.

417. The police in Burma consist of two civil police forces —(1) the District Police and the Rangoon Police which are organised on much the same lines as the police forces in the other Indian Provinces and whose main duty is that of detecting and preventing 45

Burma White Paper Proposals 6—2.

crime and (2) ten battalions of the Burma Military Police. Six battalions of the latter are frontier battalions, stationed almost wholly in the excluded tribal areas contiguous to the frontiers, and may be described as a watch and ward gendarmerie. Of the other four battalions one is a reserve battalion which provides drafts 5 mainly for the frontier battalions and is also responsible for the protection of the railways in times of internal disorder and three are garrison battalions, two with headquarters in Rangoon and one in Mandalay. These though organised on a battalion footing, serve in the districts in small detachments as patrolling parties and as 10 a backing to the District Police and also supply Treasury guards and prisoners escorts. The latter service requires a well armed and highly disciplined personnel, and is entrusted in other Provinces to the so-called armed reserves of the civil police which do not exist under that name in Burma. 15

417 We are informed that it is in contemplation to place the six frontier battalions and the reserve battalion of the Military Police directly under the Governor as part of the defence organisation, though it is not intended that they shall form part of the regular Defence Force or lose their primary police character. If, as we understand, these battalions are at the present time stationed in the Excluded Areas in proximity to the frontiers, it would clearly be impossible to transfer them with the ordinary civil police to the control of a Minister, and the proposed arrangement seems to us a reasonable and convenient one. We are informed also that in times of grave internal disorder the reserve battalion, and to a limited extent the frontier battalions also, have been called upon to act as additional police outside the Excluded Areas, before recourse is had to military aid, and if in future they become part of the defence organisation under the control of the Governor, it would be possible for the latter in the exercise of his special responsibility for the prevention of grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of Burma to deal effectively with a threatened outbreak without the use of troops, or alternatively to place additional forces at the disposal of the Minister for the same purpose.

organization of Burma Military
Police

418 It is intended, we understand, that the three garrison battalions should pass under the control of the Minister responsible for law and order as part of the police force of the Districts, and they would thus correspond to the armed reserves of the civil police in the other Provinces. The frontier and reserve battalions would, however, be available as a reserve striking force in the event of serious disturbance wherever it might occur, or to provide reliefs for men on continuous duty in the districts. These proposals seem to us to be well conceived. The Governor's responsibility for the preservation in the last resource of law and order in Burma may well be heavier than in many of the Indian Provinces, but his position will be stronger in that he will have under his own control the battalions of Military

Garrison

Department of Defence and the resources which it can afford in the way of additional military police as well as of troops. We have only one suggestion to make. In view of the reservation to the Governor of the Department of Defence, we are disposed to think that the designation of the three garrison battalions which will henceforth be under the control of the Minister as Military Police may tend to confusion. We suggest, therefore, that some other designation should be adopted, and perhaps "the Burma Constabulary" might be regarded as appropriate.

419 The Governor is to have a special responsibility in respect of (a) the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of Burma or any part thereof, (b) the safeguarding of the financial stability and credit of Burma, (c) the safeguarding of the legitimate interests of minorities, (d) the securing to the members of the public services of any rights provided for them by the Constitution Act and the safeguarding of their legitimate interests, (e) the prevention of commercial discrimination, (f) the administration of certain Partially Excluded Areas, and (g) any matter which affects the administration of any department of government under the direction and control of the Governor. It will be seen that these special responsibilities are substantially the same as those proposed in the case of the Governor-General and Governors of Provinces, and all that we have said upon them elsewhere applies equally in the case of Burma. The suggestion in the Joint Memorandum submitted

Governor's

by certain of the Burman Delegates that any dispute on the question 25 whether in a particular case the Governor's special responsibilities are involved should be referred to the Privy Council for decision completely misapprehends the principle underlying the Proposals, and nothing would be more likely to check a healthy constitutional development than to make the relations between the Governor and 30 his Ministers a matter of law rather than of constitutional usage and practice. There are certain aspects of commercial discrimination in the case of Burma which are of sufficient importance to demand separate treatment, and we also leave for subsequent consideration the question of the Excluded Areas. 35

The Reserved Departments

Defence.

420 The subject of Defence has not the same importance in Burma as it has in India, for there is no North West Frontier problem but, as the Statutory Commission observe, Burma has on her own borders a less definite but potential danger which, if it actually emerged in 40 concrete shape, she could not deal with single-handed¹. So long as this is so it is clear that the Department of Defence must remain under the exclusive control and administration of the Governor and the more so since the main pre-occupation of those responsible for the defence of Burma must always lie in the vast Excluded Areas of 45 the Province which are also to remain under the Governor's control. It is proposed, and we think rightly, that the Governor should also have the title of Commander in Chief. The executive military power will be vested in him, as the head of the Executive Government, and the size of a Burma Defence Force would not in an, event justify 5 the separate appointment of a Commander in Chief for Burma. We have already mentioned the proposals which are in contemplation with regard to the transfer of certain battalions of the Burma Military Police to the defence organisation. The personnel of these battalions at the present time is, we understand, for the most part Indian, being 10 drawn from men who have served their time with Indian regiments and whether as time goes on it will be found possible to replace these with Burma personnel is not a matter on which we are competent to express any opinion. We may refer to what we have said on this subject in connection with Indian army problems but we desire 15 also to point out that the policing and protection of the Excluded Areas which lie along the frontiers of Burma and which form so large a proportion of the total area of the country involve military considerations of a special kind which do not arise in India. We refer hereafter to the powers which the Burma Legislature will possess in 20 connection with legislation for the enforcement of army discipline.

Other
Reserved Departments.

421 External affairs and ecclesiastical affairs need no comment. The affairs of the Excluded Areas raise however various questions which it will be more convenient to discuss separately.¹

Monetary policy currency
coinage.

422 The reservation to the Governor of matters relating to monetary policy currency and coinage, differentiates the Burma White Paper proposals from those of India in a very important respect. In India it is proposed that the Federal Ministers shall be responsible generally for finance the Governor General having only a special responsibility for the safeguarding of the financial stability and credit 30 of the Federation, with a financial adviser to assist him in the discharge of this responsibility. But it has always been made clear by His Majesty's Government that the establishment of a Reserve Bank, free from political influence, to which the management of currency and exchange could be entrusted, was a condition precedent to the transfer to Ministers of responsibility for the finance of the Federation. The Reserve Bank has now been established and has every prospect of success, and the condition precedent will therefore be fulfilled. But there is no separate Reserve Bank in Burma, nor, so far as we are aware, is it in contemplation to establish one, and we agree therefore that monetary policy, currency and coinage is properly reserved to the Governor.

423 It is proposed to empower the Governor to appoint at his discretion not more than three Counsellors to assist him in the administration of the Reserve Departments. He will also be empowered at his discretion, but after consultation with his Ministers to appoint a Financial Adviser to assist him and also to advise Ministers on matters regarding which they may seek advice. The duties of the Financial Adviser will necessarily cover a wider field than those of the Financial Adviser to the Governor-General of India, not only because of the reservation to the Governor of matters relating to monetary policy, currency and coinage, but also because the Government of Burma will be a unitary Government, uniting itself the financial powers which in India will be shared between the Federal and the Provincial Governments. In these circumstances, we do not think that we can endorse the proposal in the Burma White Paper that one of the Counsellors may, at the discretion of the Governor, be appointed Financial Adviser. We assume that the proposal is based upon grounds of economy, but it seems to us that any saving in expense which might be effected by a combination of the two offices would be more than counter-balanced by the disadvantages which in our opinion would result. We think that Ministers would be unlikely to avail themselves freely of the services of a Financial Adviser who was also in administrative charge of a Reserved Department and directly under the control of the Governor. It is also very important that the Financial Adviser should be in a position in which he could take an impartial and independent view of the whole financial situation, in relation to both the Transferred and the Reserved Departments, and if he were at the same time one of the Governor's Counsellors he could scarcely avoid finding himself from time to time in a position in which his interest in one capacity conflicted with his duty in the other.

The Legislature

424 It is proposed that the Legislature shall consist of the King represented by the Governor and two Houses, to be styled the Senate and the House of Representatives. The Senate is to consist of not more than 36 members of whom 18 would be elected by the House of Representatives, and 18, who may not be officials, would be nominated by the Governor in his discretion. The House of Representatives is to consist of 133 members, of whom 119 would be elected to represent general constituencies, and 14 to represent special constituencies. The Governor-General's Counsellors are to be ex-officio members of both Houses for all purposes, except the right to vote. The Senate is not to sit for any fixed term, but one-quarter of its members are to retire every two years. The House of Representatives is to continue for five years unless sooner dissolved.¹

The two Houses

Composition of the Houses and franchise.

425 There are no detailed proposals with regard either to the composition of the Houses or to the franchise in the Burma White Paper but the Secretary of State has since submitted a Memorandum, which is printed among the Records of the Committee, 45

which contains valuable suggestions with regard to both these subjects.¹ In our opinion suitable provisions can be embodied in the future Constitution Act on the basis of these suggestions but, though we give them our general approval there are nevertheless certain points in which we think that they require modification 5 and to these we draw attention in the paragraphs which follow

Objections
to system of rotational retirements for Senate.

426 We understand that in the case of those members of the Senate who are to be elected by the House of Representatives, the intention is to adopt the method of the single transferable vote. So far as this is designed to avoid the necessity of communal representation, it has our cordial approval; but we do not think that it will effect its object viz to secure adequate representation to substantial minorities if the proposal in the Burma White Paper is retained, whereby one-quarter of the Senate retires at the expiration of every period of two years. It has been pointed out in memoranda 15 submitted to us by the Burma Chamber of Commerce and others that at the first election, when the full number of 18 seats are to be filled and the requisite quota of votes will be eight, the European Indian and Karen communities at any rate could count on securing the election of their candidates but that at the ensuing periodic 20 elections, with only nine vacant seats to fill, no minority candidate could be elected unless all the minority representatives in the Lower House pooled their votes, because the necessary quota would be too large. Alternative proposals have been made to meet this difficulty but none seem to overcome it entirely and after full 25 consideration we have come to the conclusion that the system of rotational retirement is unsuitable and that the better plan would be to provide that the life of the Senate shall be for a fixed period of seven years, unless it is sooner dissolved. But even so the problem of casual vacancies, which always causes difficulty under proportional 30 representation systems has to be faced, if the minorities are not to be placed in an increasingly unfavourable position as the seven years draw to a close. We have considered more than one plan for meeting this difficulty none of which are wholly satisfactory and we think that the best course will be to provide that where a casual 35 vacancy occurs in a seat held by the representative of a minority community only candidates of the same community as the vacating member shall be eligible. We recognise that this to some extent introduces a communal element into the Senate which we regret but we do not see how in the circumstances it is to be avoided. An 40 alternative suggestion was that casual vacancies should be filled by the Governor's nomination but we have felt bound to reject this for reasons which it is unnecessary to elaborate

Composition of House of Representatives

427 The proposals for the composition of the House of Representatives are fully set out in the Secretary of State's Memorandum, to which we have referred. They provide for 119 general 45 constituencies and 11 special constituencies. Of the general constituencies, 91 would be non-communal, 12 Karen, 8 Indian, 2 Anglo-Indian, and 3 European. The special constituencies are the University of Rangoon, the Burmese Chamber of Commerce, the Burma-Indian Chamber of Commerce, the Burma-European Chamber of Commerce, the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, the Rangoon Trades Association (European), and Labour (two Indian and two Burman). Out of the non-communal constituencies, three seats would be reserved for women. It will be observed that these proposals are based upon communal representation with separate electorates. We had hoped that it would have been possible to abandon the principle of communal representation in the case of Burma, however necessary it may be for British-India, but we have reluctantly come to the conclusion that, for the present at any rate, this is an impracticable ideal. It is true that there is very little religious cleavage in Burma, since, as we have already observed, toleration is a marked characteristic of the Buddhist creed. There are however racial cleavages, among the indigenous races there is a clear-cut division between Burman and Karen, and the division between the indigenous and non-indigenous (mainly European and Indian) communities is as marked as is the division between the non-indigenous communities themselves. We are not to be understood as suggesting that the different communities live otherwise than in amity with one another, although the feeling between Burman and Indian, especially as competitors in the labour market, from time to time becomes acute, but each community has its own culture and outlook on life, and these do not always blend. It is also to be observed that the minorities have their own representation at the present time in the Burman Legislature, and we are clear that none of them would be prepared to abandon it, indeed, the Burman Delegates themselves with few exceptions, recognised, even if reluctantly, that the claim was one which must be met. We therefore accept the proposals in principle, but we are glad to observe a suggestion in the Secretary of State's Memorandum that it should be permissible for persons who are not members of the communities concerned to stand as candidates for communal constituencies. We endorse this suggestion, and we hope that it may help in the course of time to break down the barrier which at present exists.

428 It will be observed that three of the ninety-four non-communal seats are, under the proposals in the Memorandum, to be reserved for women. The representative of the women of Burma informed us, however, that Burman women did not desire this reservation, and we are satisfied that this is so. In these circumstances the question arises whether these three seats should be eliminated altogether or assigned elsewhere possibly as an addition to the representation of special interests. We are of opinion on the information before us that the special interests are already adequately represented, and that the total number of the House of Representatives should therefore be 130 instead of 133.

seats

429 We agree generally with the proposals in the Memorandum for the franchise for the Lower House which will result in a substantial increase in the electorate. The present electorate of Burma consists of 1,956,000 men and 124,000 women, and the proposals in the Memorandum will increase this number to 2,300,000 men and 700,000 women, or 23.26 per cent of the total population,

Franchise
for House of Representatives

as against 18.9 per cent. The increase in the number of women voters is very striking: the proportion to the adult female population is increased from 4 per cent. to about 21 per cent., and the proportion of women to men voters from 1:4.3 to 1:3.5. In British India 10 our recommendations would increase the number of voters from 3 per cent. of the total population of British India to 14 per cent. and the proportion of women to men voters from 1:20 to between 1:4.5 and 1:5. and it may be asked why Burma should be accorded such exceptionally favourable treatment. The answer to this is 15 that the standard of living is considerably higher in Burma than in India and this is reflected in a franchise which is for the most part necessarily based on a property qualification. We are informed that, despite this large extension of the franchise, the Government of Burma regard the proposals as administratively practicable and, 20 that being so we accept them. The representative of the women of Burma urged that a wifehood franchise should, as in India, be included and, having regard to the position which women hold in Burma we should have been glad to give favourable consideration to this suggestion. We are informed however that the inclusion of 25 a wifehood franchise would increase the number of women voters to a figure approximating to 2,000,000 and that so great an increase in the electorate would present for some years to come an insuperable administrative obstacle. This we can well believe and we may point out that this qualification has been adopted in India not so 30 much on its merits as a means of reducing the disparity between the proportion of women and men voters to a ratio as low as 1:4 whereas, even without the wifehood qualification, the proportion in Burma would be approximately 1:3.5.

Powers of Legislature

430. The proposals of the Burma White Paper with regard to the 35 powers of the Legislature follow the same lines as those in the case of India and need no further comment except on two points. As in the case of the Indian Legislatures the Burma Legislature will have no power to make any law affecting the Army, Air Force, and Naval Discipline Acts but it is likely that for some time to come Indian 40 forces will be serving in Burma the members of which are subject to the corresponding Indian Acts, and it is clear that it should also be beyond the competence of the Burma Legislature to repeal or amend any of the latter Acts. There will also be certain restrictions on the power of the Burma Legislature to pass discriminatory 45 legislation affecting persons domiciled in the United Kingdom but questions will also arise as to their power to pass such legislation affecting persons domiciled in British India. This however is a matter which will be more conveniently discussed later when the subject of discrimination in general is being considered.

Relations between the two House.

431. Since the functions of the Government in Burma after separation will extend to all matters which in India will fall within the Federal as well as within the Provincial sphere, it would seem 5 at first sight that the Senate in Burma should correspond, whether in size or in the extent of its powers, rather to the Federal Council of State than to any of the Provincial Legislative Councils. If the House of Representatives has 130 members the Senate, on the Indian analogy should have a membership of nearly 100. The pro- 10 posals in the Burma White Paper however contemplate as we have said a Senate of 36 members only and we understand that this accords generally with the views expressed at the Burma Round Table Conference. We do not think that any larger body would be

15 appropriate to the circumstances of Burma, but, that being so, it must follow that the Senate must be regarded as a body having 20 revisory and delaying powers like the Upper House in an Indian Province, rather than one possessing substantially equal powers with the Lower House, like the Council of State. But since the powers
 25 of the Burma Legislature will extend over a wider field than those of the Provincial Legislatures in India, we think that the Senate may properly be invested with certain powers which a Provincial Legislative Council does not possess. We accordingly recommend that though Demands for Grants should be a matter for the House 30 of Representatives alone, it should be permissible to introduce Bills, including Money Bills, in either House. Conflicts between the two Houses should be resolved in the manner which we have recommended in the case of the Indian Provinces, with this modification, that it should be permissible for a Bill passed by the Senate, but 35 rejected by the House of Representatives, also to be referred for decision to a Joint Session.

(3) SPECIAL SUBJECTS

(a) Excluded and Partially Excluded Areas

132 The Burma White Paper proposes that Excluded Areas
 35 should be reserved to the exclusive administration and control of the Governor, but that Partially Excluded Areas should pass under the control of Ministers, though the Governor will be declared to have a special responsibility in respect of the administration of these areas. The Excluded Areas are to be those areas which have been 40 under the existing law notified as "backward tracts", the Partially Excluded Areas are to be those which are at the present time not removed from the jurisdiction of the Burma Legislature, but which have been excluded from the operation of the Burma Rural Self-Government Act and do not return members to the Legislative 45 Council. The area comprised in the first category extends to 90,200 square miles, with a population of approximately 1,900,000, the second to 23,000 square miles, with a population of approximately 370,000, and when it is remembered that the total area of Burma is 234,000 square miles, it will be seen that the Excluded and Partially Excluded Areas together comprise very nearly one-half of the area

 5 of the whole Province, though they are only inhabited by about one-seventh of the population. Various questions arise with regard to these areas, which it is necessary to consider in some detail.

433 In the first place, the distinction which is at present drawn between the Excluded and Partially Excluded Areas appears to be 10 to some extent an arbitrary one, and we find it difficult to understand why some of the Partially Excluded Areas have never been notified as backward tracts, though perhaps the reason may be, in some cases at any rate, that they are of so primitive a character that they have remained practically unadministered and it was therefore a 15 matter of indifference whether they were classified in one category or the other. The Secretary of State's Memorandum,¹ which we understand reflects the views of the Government of Burma, suggests that, where an area has never been formally declared a backward tract and does not consist exclusively of hill districts, it is undesirable
 20 to withdraw it from the scope of Ministers and the Legislature, and that it should therefore continue to be regarded as a Partially Excluded Area only. We cannot accept this suggestion, nor do we agree that the omissions of the past should necessarily be perpetuated

nature of

in the future. Such information as we have leads us to think that the Salween district should certainly become an Excluded Area. With regard to the others, our information is not precise enough to enable us to make detailed recommendations but we are of opinion that the Government of Burma should be requested to examine the whole question de novo and to advise whether, notwithstanding the present legal position, any districts which it is proposed should form part of a Partially Excluded Area are of such a character that their notification as backward tracts would be justified, if the matter were at large.

434. We have no doubt at all that the Excluded Areas should remain under the Exclusive administration and control of the Governor. The Joint Memorandum of the Burman Delegates expresses the opinion that there should be no wholly Excluded Areas except those included in the Shan States Federation but the arguments advanced in support of this opinion seem to us to misapprehend entirely the reasons which underlie the proposals in the Burma White Paper. We do not think that we can do better than quote a passage from the Secretary of State's Memorandum, with which we find ourselves in complete agreement.

It is important to remember that the word backward, which is the technical term used to denote areas notified under Section 52A of the Government of India Act, 1919 may lead to a serious misunderstanding of the position. It suggests that the difference between these tracts and the ordinary districts is one of degree of development which will necessarily tend to disappear with time. This is far from the whole truth. The existing backward tracts are hill districts lying on the north west and east of Burma, and resembling in their general characteristics the backward tracts along the eastern border of Assam. Their inhabitants mainly Kachins, Chins and Shans, differ radically from those of the plains in race, religion, law, customs and language and most of these differences will be bridged, not by a simple process of development, but by the much slower and more difficult process of abandonment of their existing culture. It is the absence of common outlook and aspirations which is perhaps the main factor militating against the assimilation of the backward tracts in the hills in the political institutions of the plains. The history of the relations between the backward tracts and the plains is one of opposition and hostility, and the main reason for undertaking the administration of the tracts was the protection of the plains. Such feelings of antipathy die slowly in remote places and the inhabitants of the backward tracts are still devoid of any real sense of community political or otherwise with the plains. Further, the inhabitants of the backward tracts are ignorant of conditions in the plains and those of the plains are equally ignorant of conditions in the tracts. It is true that since the annexation of Upper Burma civilising influences have been at work. The Kachins come down with confidence from their hills to market in the villages of the plains and mix more freely with the plainsmen and in some areas they have come under the influence of missionaries. Kachins and Chins also are recruited to the Burma Rifles and Burma Military Police. But the fact remains that the plains and the backward tracts are different words with no adequate mutual knowledge and no adequate contact by which such knowledge may be readily dimised. The 'backward tracts' in Burma are admittedly not ripe for representative institutions and have not, it is believed, shown any desire for them. The time will not be ripe for such a change until conditions in the tracts have undergone a fundamental change and until then inhabitants have learned to feel that they are part of a larger political whole. Such a state of affairs is not likely to come to pass within any period that can at present be foreseen. Meanwhile, the Provincial Legislature, however capable of legislating for the plans which it knows and represents, is clearly not qualified to legislate for people it does not represent and for conditions of which it has no adequate knowledge. Added to this is the consideration that law in the backward tracts is mainly customary law supplemented by simple regulations issued under Section 71 of the Government of India Act—a very refractory substance for amalgamation with acts of the Legislature.”¹

Records (1933-34), A1 p 95.

Difference between Excluded Areas and rest of Burma one of kind and not of degree.

135 The Joint Memorandum of the Burman draws The Shan States attention to certain financial arrangements in connection with the Shan States, and recommends that the contribution from Burma revenues to those States should cease and that the States should be required to pay their share of the cost of defence and general administration. We think that the Delegates are under some misapprehension in this matter, for we are informed that no such contribution has been made for the last two years, and that there is no intention of renewing it. We understand the intention to be that after separation the Shan States should be credited with a share of receipts from customs duties proportionate to the consumption of dutiable articles in their area, and with a similar share of income tax and other taxes which are at the present time central sources of revenue, but which will, after separation, be levied in Burma for the purposes of the local Government. The Shan States will in their turn contribute a fixed sum representing the share fairly allocable to them of central expenditure which will in future be borne by Burma, and of the cost of general administration from which the States derive benefit equally with the rest of Burma. This appears to us a reasonable arrangement. We should perhaps explain that the Shan States, though British territory are a quasi-autonomous area administered by the Shan Sawbwas or Chiefs under the general supervision of the Governor, and that since 1922 they have been formed into a species of Federation for certain common purposes. The finances of the Federation have always been kept distinct from the provincial finances of Burma, and we think it desirable that this arrangement should continue. Special provision for this purpose will, we think, be required in the Constitution Act, and we are of opinion (1) that the share of revenue which the Shan States are to receive, as indicated above, and the contribution which they are to make to Burma revenues, should be fixed from time to time by Order in Council, (2) that the States' share of revenue, when fixed, should be a non-votable head of expenditure appropriated for the purposes of the administration of the States, and (3) that the contribution of the States should not be paid directly to Burma revenues but allocated to the Governor for the same purposes. The Burman Joint Memorandum suggests that the financial settlement between the Shan States and Burma (i.e. the determination of the share of revenue and of the States contribution) should be referred to an impartial tribunal and should not be left to be dealt with by the Governor. We understand that in fact a committee of three officers, one representing Burma, one the Shan States, with an independent chairman, has already been set up for the purpose of advising the Governor on this matter and in these circumstances we do not think that any useful purpose would be served by the appointment of an extraneous tribunal.

Financial arrangements for Excluded Areas.

436 We understand the Burman Delegates also to suggest that the financial arrangements for other Excluded Areas should be the same as those for the Shan States, that their expenditure should be met out of their own revenue and that they should have a budget separate from the general Burma budget. There does not seem to us to be any true analogy between the two cases. The Shan States are a compact area, and for all common purposes form a single organised administrative unit this cannot be said of any of the other Excluded Areas. We think, therefore, that the Burma White Paper rightly proposes that the money required for the administration of those areas, apart from the Shan States, should come from Burma general revenues, and should be a non-votable head of expenditure. We may however draw attention to the fact that the forests in the Excluded Areas are at the present time and will continue to be, under the administration of the Forest Department, which since 1923 has been one of the transferred departments and the Excluded Areas make a substantial contribution through this channel to the general revenues of Burma.

Karen
States and Nanwan.

437 We have mentioned previously the Karen States, an area of 4,000 square miles with a population of 64,000 which lies on the eastern border of Burma and is not British territory. There is also a small non-British enclave known as the Assigned Tract of Nanwan, which is held on a perpetual lease from China in order to facilitate frontier transit questions. It is proposed that these two areas shall be treated on the same footing as Excluded Areas, and that the trifling sums required for administrative purposes in connection with them shall be treated as expenditure on an Excluded Area. In view of the smallness of the areas involved, this seems a convenient arrangement but we assume that since they are not British territory, it will still be necessary to legislate for them by means of Foreign Jurisdiction Act procedure.

(b) The Public Services

Proposals
generally the same for India
Services.

438. The proposals in the Burma White Paper on this subject are substantially the same mutatis mutandis as those in the case of India, and it is only necessary to draw attention to one or two special points. The services in Burma which will in future correspond to the Indian Civil Service and the Indian Police will necessarily have different designations but present members of the Indian Civil Service who are serving in Burma have informed us of their desire to be still described as members of that Service, and to this we see no objection. In the case of Central Service officers now serving in Burma, it is proposed that those who were recruited by the Government of India for service in Burma alone should be compulsorily transferred to the service of the Government of Burma but that those who were recruited either by the Secretary of State or by the Government of India without special reference to service in Burma should only be liable to transfer to the Government of Burma with their consent and the consent of the authority who appointed them. This seems a reasonable distinction to draw, and we approve it.

139 Burma has one Service which has no exact counterpart in India, viz., the Burma Frontier Service. This is now controlled and recruited by the local Government, but it comprises officers (for example, officers transferred from the Indian Army and some others) who enjoy rights guaranteed by the Secretary of State. We approve the proposal in the Burma White Paper that this service should be recruited and controlled by the Governor in his discretion, since most of the officers who belong to it would be serving in Excluded Areas under the control of the Governor.¹

140 When the Burma White Paper was first published, the question of continued recruitment by the Secretary of State to the Medical and the Railway Services was still under examination. We understand, however, from the subsequent Memorandum submitted to us by the Secretary of State that the intention now is that the proposed statutory Railway Board for Burma shall, in conjunction with the Public Service Commission, control recruitment.² We have already recommended that recruitment for the railway service in India should be in the hands of the new Railway Board, and we see no reason why the same principle should not be applied also in the case of Burma. As regards the question of recruitment to the Medical Service, we are informed that this matter is still under consideration, and we have not sufficient information before us to make any considered recommendation, but we are disposed to think that for the time being recruitment should continue to be by the Secretary of State.³

441 We desire to draw attention to what we have already said on the subject of the Forest Service in India and the need for the co-ordination of research.⁵ Our recommendations with regard to the Forest Service in the Indian Provinces are not of course applicable as they stand to the Forest Service in Burma, but we hope nevertheless that arrangements may be made whereby the Central Institute for Research and the Training College at Dehra Dun will be available for Burma entrants. We hope too that nothing will be done which might exclude the possibility of an interchange of officers between the Forest Services of Burma and India, and we refer in this connection to certain of the recommendations of the Burma Sub-Committee of the First Round Table Conference.⁴

442 It is proposed that there should be a Public Service Commission for Burma.⁴ This we regard as an essential provision, and we think that the Constitution Act should in this respect follow the Indian model.⁵

(c) Commercial and other forms of discrimination

443 In so far as this is a matter between the United Kingdom and Burma, the proposals in the Burma White Paper, supplemented by a subsequent Memorandum submitted to us by the Secretary of State,¹ are the same as those in the case of India, and we may refer to what we have said upon the subject in an earlier part of our Report. The Burma White Paper and the Secretary of State's Memorandum, however deal also with the question of discrimination as between India and Burma after the separation of the two countries and this raises certain problems of its own

Position of Indians in Burma.

444. The Memorandum to which we have referred points out that there are in Burma over 1 000 000 persons either domiciled in India or originating from some Indian Province. Some are in the permanent service of the Government, but the greater number are labourers who only intend to stay in Burma for a few years and who 15 by accepting smaller wages tend to oust the indigenous labourer and to lower his standard of living. Others are Indian money lenders who advance money on the security of agricultural land and crops, and whose operations, especially in times of depression are such as to bring about an extensive transfer of ownership from an indigenous 20 agricultural population to a non-indigenous and non agricultural class. It is clear that in these circumstances it would be unreasonable to include in a new Constitution for Burma provisions which would in effect give to all persons domiciled in India an unrestricted right of entry into Burma and it is accordingly proposed that it should 25 be competent for the Burma Legislature to enact legislation restricting or imposing conditions of entry into Burma in respect of all persons other than British subjects domiciled in the United Kingdom. We think that this is right but we agree with the further 30 proposal which is made by the Secretary of State that with a view to preventing the imposition of vexatious or unreasonable restrictions or conditions for the entry of Indians of good standing into Burma, the introduction of any legislation regulating immigration into Burma should be subject to the Governor's prior consent. Never 35 theless, we hope that these matters will ultimately come to be arranged between India and Burma on a conventional basis, and we refer to earlier observations which we have made on this aspect of the subject. We have also expressed the opinion elsewhere that it may be desirable that any temporary Trade Agreement made between the existing Governments of the two countries with a 40 view to tidying over the difficult period immediately after separation, when the two new Governments will probably be too fully occupied with other matters to enter into a long and intricate negotiation should also include provisions relating to emigration and immigration.

restrictions.

445. There are certain legal restrictions in force at present on the 45 right of persons of non-Burman birth or domicile to compete for certain public appointments or to qualify for the exercise of certain professions and it is right that these should be retained. As regards the future the power of the Burma Legislature to impose conditions or restrictions on entry into Burma should prove a sufficient safeguard. Subject to the above modifications, we are of opinion that the question of discrimination as between India and Burma should 5 be dealt with on the same lines as that of discrimination between India and the United Kingdom.

Medical
qualifications.

446. As regards professional qualifications, other than medical we have nothing to add to what we have already said in the case of India. As regards medical qualifications, the position is different. 10 A local Burman Act at present entitles any person holding a British or Indian medical qualification to practise in Burma but also empowers the Burma Medical Council to refuse to register any practitioner who holds only a qualification conferred in a Dominion 15 or foreign country which does not recognise Indian medical degrees

 The recent action by the General Medical Council, to which we have referred elsewhere, in withdrawing their recognition of Indian medical diplomas, did not affect Burma specifically, since we understand that at that time there was no authority in Burma by which 20 such diplomas were granted, but we are informed that diplomas are now granted by the University of Rangoon. The Indian Medical Act, 1933, which sets out the Indian diplomas which entitle their holders to be placed upon the Indian register does not include among them any diploma granted in Burma but contains provisions enabling 25 Rangoon diplomas to be included in the list, if the Indian Medical Council are satisfied after investigation that the standard of proficiency prescribed by the University of Rangoon is adequate. According to our information, however, the procedure prescribed by the Act will take some time, and it is unlikely that the Rangoon diploma will 30 in fact be admitted to the list in the near future, and in these circumstances the position is one of some doubt and obscurity, especially as the Indian Act will obviously require some modification in its application to Burma after the separation of the two countries

447 We think that all persons at present practising medicine in 35 Burma by virtue of a United Kingdom or Indian qualification ought in any event to have that right assured to them. As regards the future, we hope that it will eventually be found possible by means of reciprocal arrangements between the General Medical Council and the Indian Medical Council on the one hand and the Burma 40 authorities on the other to arrive at a solution satisfactory to all concerned. In the meantime we think that United Kingdom or Indian qualifications which give a right to practise medicine in Burma at the date of the establishment of the new Government should continue to give that right, and that any withdrawal of it 45 by any Burma authority should be appealable to the Privy Council, whose decision should be final and binding on both parties. We

Suggestions
for future

think also that the new Government of Burma would be well advised to consider whether it would not be to their advantage to make arrangements with the Indian Medical Council, subject to the consent of the latter, for a common medical register for both 5 countries. An arrangement on these lines has been made, we understand, between the General Medical Council and the Irish Free State and our information is that it has in practice worked well

(d) The Railway Board

448 The Secretary of State has furnished us with a Memorandum 10 containing proposals for the constitution of a Railway Board to manage the Burman railways after separation¹. This follows in its main outlines the proposals which we have already discussed for a Railway Authority in India, but the problem is a very different one in Burma, where the railway system consists only of some 2,000 15 miles of railway, and where there are no such complications as arise in India from the existence of company-owned railways or railways belonging to Indian States. Accordingly, while the Indian Railway Board is more correctly described as a Railway Authority, the Railway Board in Burma is intended to be, in the words of the 20 Memorandum, "a Board of Directors for the one railway system owned by the State". Agreeably with this conception, it is proposed that the chief executive officer of the railways shall be ex-officio President of the Board

Modifications
suggested.

449 We agree generally with the proposals in the Memorandum subject to the following modifications. We do not think that the 25 Financial Adviser should be a member of the Board, for the same reasons which in our view make it undesirable that he should also be one of the Governor's Counsellors, since his duty and interest might at times be in conflict. We think nevertheless, that there should be a member of the Board with special financial experience 30 Secondly, it has been represented to us that the proposed ineligibility for membership of the Board of persons who have contractual relations with the railways would in the case of Burma unduly restrict the field from which suitable members might be selected. We are informed that the Government of Burma recognize the force 35 of this contention and suggest the inclusion of provisions similar to those which are to be found in the Rangoon Port Act, the effect of which is to make a personal interest in a contract a disqualification either for membership or for participation in a discussion of matters relating to such a contract. This suggestion merits, we think, 40 favourable consideration. Thirdly it seems to us that the Railway Board in Burma ought to be in a position to begin its operations contemporaneously with the establishment of the new Government, and that legislation for this purpose will therefore be necessary before the separation of the two countries. It would obviously be inappro- 45 priate for the present Legislature in India to enact such legislation and we think therefore that it must be enacted in the Constitution Act itself though it may well be found convenient to leave some of the detailed provisions to be prescribed by Order in Council.

Records [1933-34] 42 p 7

Constituent powers, etc.

450. The recommendations which we have made on these four subjects in the case of India, will, we think, be equally appropriate mutatis mutandis in the case of Burma. As regards Home Audit, however it may well be found that the amount of Burma business transacted in London will not be sufficient to justify the appointment 10 of a separate officer as Home Auditor and in that event we think that some arrangement should be made whereby the Auditor for Indian Home Accounts should also act in an agency capacity for Burma.

(f) The Secretary of State and his Advisers

The Secretary of State

451. We have recommended that the corporation known as the Secretary of State in Council should cease to exist after the establishment of Provincial Autonomy in India, and in that event the Secretary of State in Council would equally cease to exercise any functions in relation to Burma. The question has been raised 20 whether the Secretary of State for India should become in future the Secretary of State for India and Burma. The Joint Memorandum of the Burman Delegates suggests that there should be a separate Secretary of State for Burma, or else that the Secretary of State for the Dominions should hold the office. We are disposed 25 to think that the Secretary of State for India should in future hold two separate portfolios, one as Secretary of State for India and one as Secretary of State for Burma and we are of opinion that, though the two offices would be legally distinct, it is most desirable on practical grounds that they should be held by the same person 30

452 The Secretary of State, as Secretary of State for Burma, ought we think, to have a small body of Advisers, not more than two or three at the most, to advise him on Service matters but our recommendation in the case of India that the Secretary of State should be bound in certain matters by the opinion of his Advisers or a majority of them would not be altogether appropriate in the case of so small a body, and it is for consideration whether, where Service matters are concerned, the India and Burma Advisers should not sit together and advise jointly

40 (g) Financial adjustment between India and Burma

453 It is clear that on the separation of the two countries there will have to be an equitable apportionment of assets and liabilities, including under the latter head the liability for loans and loan charges which are at present a liability either of the Secretary of State or of the Government of India. The Burma White Paper contains no definite proposals as to the manner in which this apportionment is to be effected, but we assume that it will be necessary to appoint some impartial tribunal who will in the first place lay down the principles of the apportionment, leaving the application of those principles to be worked out in detail at a later date. It will be necessary to include in the Constitution Act provisions giving the force of law in both countries to the award or awards issued from time to time by the tribunal. It is also very desirable that its work should be well advanced by the time the new Government in Burma is established, and we think that steps should be taken for its appointment at as early a date as is reasonably practicable

INTRODUCTION

1 The problem of Indian Constitutional Reform, the examination of which has been entrusted to us is one of a magnitude which can hardly be exaggerated. It involves the destinies of over 350 millions of our fellow-subjects, in fact, of one-fifth of the whole human race. We do not consider that it is necessary to set out at great length the material facts and the conditions of the problem, because Volume I of the Report of the Indian Statutory Commission gave an exhaustive survey, the general accuracy of which has been recognized. We would, however, recall that since that Report was published, four years ago, great changes have taken place which have profoundly modified the conditions of the problem. In particular the Declaration of the Princes of their readiness to join an All India Federation, and the conclusions which emerged from the labours of British and Indian statesmen at the three Round Table Conferences are factors in the situation of the utmost importance.

The
before us.

2. The whole subject-matter of Constitutional reform in India has been reviewed many times since the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms. In addition to the very informative Reports of the Reforms Inquiry Committee, the Reports by the Government of India and the Provincial Governments on the working of the present Constitution and the exhaustive Inquiry of the Indian Statutory Commission there have been committees dealing with special parts of the problem, notably the Butler Committee on the relationship between the Indian States and the paramount power the Indian Sandhurst Committee, and the Territorial and Auxiliary Forces Committee both of which dealt with the question of the Army in India. Further there have been the three Sessions of the India Round Table Conference and the various sub-committees appointed to assist it, and of the Burma Round Table Conference. In addition to this large volume of evidence dealing primarily with political questions, there have been the Reports of the Committee presided over by Lord Lunithgow on Agriculture, and that on Labour presided over by Mr Whitley which provide a mine of information on economic and social matters. We have ourselves been sitting for many months and have received and examined many memoranda and heard many witnesses. In addition we have had the valuable assistance of representative Indian men and women who have participated with us in hearing and examining witnesses and discussions on the White Paper proposals. We cannot therefore, complain that there is not enough material on which to work. Indeed, the mass of memoranda and evidence is almost beyond the power of any human being fully to digest.

Constitution.

3. After having heard and considered the whole of the evidence and discussions on this Joint Select Committee we have come to the conclusion that the principle on which the new Constitution for India should be founded is the right of the Indian peoples to full self government and self-determination, and should have as its aim the establishing of India at the earliest possible moment as an equal partner with the other members of the British Commonwealth of Nations. We hold that the new Constitution should contain within itself provisions for its own development and that such safeguards as are necessary should be in the interests of India and that the Reserved Powers should not be such as to prejudice the advance of India through the new Constitution to full responsibility for her own government. We are convinced that this policy is the only one that is consistent with the pledges that have been given to India and that nothing short of that will ensure the continuance of India as a willing and contented partner in the British Commonwealth of Nations.

The
two-fold
problem.

4. In our view the problem before us is two-fold. We have on the one hand to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the peoples of India for self government and so to implement the pledges given over a period of years by the Government of this country. Secondly we have to ensure that self government shall be given to India in such a way as to ensure that the new Constitution shall place in the hands of the mass of rural cultivators and urban wage earners the possibility of attaining to political power and that as far as possible ample protection shall be given to racial religious and cultural minorities. We have to recognize that for more than two centuries the whole course of the development of Indian society has been powerfully influenced by the presence of the British in India. During that time Great Britain has by its action made itself responsible for the social and economic system which it has preserved in India and it cannot escape its responsibility. In handing over power to other hands it must ensure that the interests of the weaker sections of the community are safeguarded.

5 We consider it is necessary to emphasize again what is the goal of British policy in India. That goal is nothing less than Dominion Status. It is not possible for India to reach this goal at one single step, but we are in entire agreement with the Members of the Indian Delegation, that this goal should be clearly stated in the Constitution Act itself. We are the more insistent on this point because evidence has been put before us, with which we wish to record our entire disagreement, which purported to show that Dominion Status, with all its implications, never formed the subject of any pledge to India.

6 The pledges given to India have been very many. We wish to state here those which we consider to be the most material. We would first recall the historical declaration of Mr. Edwin Montagu, Secretary of State for India, in the House of Commons, on the 20th of August, 1917, which was in these terms: "The policy of His Majesty's Government, with which the Government of India are in complete accord, is that of the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration and the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realization of responsible government in India as an integral part of the British Empire."¹ That declaration was embodied in the Preamble to the Government of India Act of 1919, which states as follows: "Whereas it is the declared policy of Parliament to provide for the increasing association of Indians in every branch of Indian Administration, and for the gradual development of self-governing institutions, with a view to the progressive realization of responsible Government in British India as an integral part of the Empire."

And whereas progress in giving effect to this policy can only be achieved by successive stages, and it is expedient that substantial steps in this direction should now be taken.

And whereas the time and manner of each advance can be determined only by Parliament, upon whom responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian peoples.

And whereas the action of Parliament in such matters must be guided by the co-operation received from those on whom new opportunities of service will be conferred, and by the extent to which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility.

And whereas concurrently with the gradual development of self-governing institutions in the Provinces of India it is expedient to give to those Provinces in provincial matters the largest measure of independence of the Government of India, which is compatible with the due discharge by the latter of its own responsibilities."

7 This was given even greater publicity and emphasis by the statement of H. M. The King Emperor, read by H. R. H. The Duke of Connaught, on the 9th February, 1921, to the new Indian Legislature, which contained these words:—"For years, it may be for generations, patriotic and loyal Indians have dreamed of Swaraj for their Motherland. To-day you have the beginnings of Swaraj within my Empire, and the widest scope and ample opportunity for progress to the liberty which my other Dominions enjoy." The same point is made in the revised Instrument of Instructions from His Majesty The King Emperor to the Governor-General of India, dated the 15th March, 1921, which states:—"For above all things it is our will and pleasure that the plans laid by our Parliament may come to fruition to the end that British India may attain its true place among our Dominions."

On the 31st October, 1929, the object of British rule was explicitly reaffirmed by Lord Irwin, when, speaking with the full authority of the British Cabinet, he said that it was "implicit in the declaration of 1917 that the natural issue of Indian Constitutional progress, as there contemplated, is the attainment of Dominion Status."

Lastly there are the concluding words of the Prime Minister at the Final Session of the first Round Table Conference in January, 1931:—"Finally, I hope, and I trust, and I pray that by our labours together

India will come to possess the only thing she now lacks to give her the status of a Dominion amongst the British Commonwealth of Nations—what she now lacks for that—the responsibilities and the cares, the burdens and the difficulties, but the pride and the honour of responsible self government. The Prime Minister, as head of the National Government, confirmed the statement of policy then made in the words 'My colleagues fully accept that statement of January last as representing their own policy' ¹

Mr. Churchill's
statement

8. An attempt has been made by witnesses before us, notably by Mr Winston Churchill, to argue that Dominion Status meant something different from that which it was understood by Indians at the time to mean, and that it did not involve the grant to India of a status equal to Australia and Canada. He argued also that Dominion Status is only a distant, remote goal which it is not practicable to take into consideration in any period of which human beings need take account.² We find it difficult to reconcile that meaning with the eloquent words of Mr. Churchill in June, 1921, when he was Secretary of State for the Dominions and Colonies. In a public speech to the Prime Ministers of the British Dominions and Representatives of India, he said, there was another great part of the Empire represented at that gathering which had not yet become a Dominion, but which moved forward under the Montagu scheme in the work which began with Lord Morley and was continued by Lord Chelmsford, towards a great Dominion Status,³ and, further 'We owed India that deep debt, and we looked forward confidently to the days when the Indian Government and people would have assumed fully and completely their Dominion Status.'

certainty

9 We ourselves have no doubt that in India these various statements and pledges were understood in their natural meaning that is to say, that India could look forward to attaining within a reasonable period of time the same status as that of the other Dominions of the British Commonwealth. We feel that nothing could be more unfortunate for the creation of a fruitful partnership between the peoples of this country and India than that words understood in one sense should be subsequently explained away and given a different meaning. We agree with the contention of the Indian Delegates to this Committee when they say in their Memorandum that

'Indian public opinion has been profoundly disturbed by the attempts made during the last two or three years to qualify the repeated pledges given by responsible Ministers on behalf of His Majesty's Government. Since it is apparently contended that only a definite statement in an Act of Parliament would be binding on future Parliaments, and that even the solemn declaration made by His Majesty The King Emperor on a formal occasion is not authoritative, we feel that a declaration in the preamble is essential in order to remove present grave misgivings and avoid future misunderstandings.'⁴

Constitution.

10 We therefore consider that this country is bound to implement this pledge of honour and to that end we desire that the new Constitution should state beyond all cavil that it is the intention of this country to grant full Dominion Status to India within a measurable period of years, and that the Constitution itself should contain possibilities of expansion and development which may without further Act of Parliament, realize this objective. We would express our entire agreement with the view of the Indian Statutory Commission that 'The first principle which we would lay down is that the new Constitution should as far as possible, contain within itself provision for its own development.'⁵ And we would quote further from their Report 'It has been a characteristic of the evolution of responsible government in other parts of the British Empire that the details of the constitution have not been exhaustively defined in statutory language. On the contrary, the Constitutions of the self-governing parts of the British Empire have developed as the result of natural growth, and progress has depended not so much on changes made at intervals in the language of an Act of Parliament, as on the development of conventions, and on the terms of instructions issued from time to time to the Crown's representative. The Preamble to the Government of India Act declares that progress in giving effect to the policy of the progressive realization of responsible government in British India can only be achieved by successive stages, but there is no reason why the length of these successive stages should be defined in advance, or why every stage should be marked by a commission of inquiry. We are profoundly convinced that this method of inquiry at stated intervals has had a most injurious effect on the working of the reformed Constitution, and on Indian political life.¹ They further state "We believe that what is required is a constitution which, without doing this, will contain some element of elasticity enabling adjustments to be made in accordance with the conditions actually obtaining in any given province at any particular time."² We are concerned to give the fullest measure of self-government to India, because the people of this country, having for so many years enjoyed responsible self-government themselves, should not deny it to other parts of the Empire. We consider that the only limiting factors which prevent the grant of full responsible self-government and Dominion Status to India at the present time are those which arise not from any opposition in this country but from the facts of the situation.

11 We fully recognize the great work that Great Britain has done in India, especially in giving her a sense of political unity which was wanting for so many years, and we are conscious of the many material advantages bestowed by Great Britain and the devotion with which the members of the Public Services have carried out their tasks as servants of India, but we recognize that one of the most striking effects of British rule has been the emergence of a national consciousness in India and the natural desire that Indians should manage their own affairs. We desire to give the fullest possible expression to this national consciousness and to make provision by means of a reformed Constitution for the living forces of Indian Nationalism to be harnessed to the great tasks which confront any government in India. We agree with the statement in the Report of the Indian Statutory Commission, that "until the demands of Nationalism have been reasonably met, enthusiasts for various reforms make common cause with every discontented element and attribute all the evils that they attack to the absence of self-government. In our view the most formidable of the evils from which India is suffering have their roots in social and economic customs of long standing which can only be remedied by the action of the Indian peoples themselves."

12 While, however, we desire to give full weight to the claims of Indian Nationalism, we are not unmindful that unless political changes result in giving a better life to the ordinary citizen, they are of little value. We are not blind to the fact that in India, as in most parts of the world, the masses of the people are the prey of economic exploitation. A change in the Constitution which would put the Indian rural population and the urban wage-earners at the mercy of a politically dominant section in possession of economic power might very well intensify the very evils which we desire to see eradicated. While recognizing the public spirit and zeal for reform of many leading Indian statesmen we cannot but recognize the fact that the majority of the active and politically-minded Indians belong to the privileged and well-to-do classes that the Hindu social system is based on inequality, and that, in India as elsewhere, the power of wealth in politics is inevitably very strong. We have seen many examples in Europe of nationalist movements, the supporters of which, when striving for political freedom, have professed the keenest desire for advanced social legislation, and have proclaimed a profound faith in democracy but on many occasions when freedom from alien rule has been obtained the nationalist governments which followed have exhibited outstanding examples of tyranny, reaction, and social injustice, and it would in our view be unwise and unduly optimistic to ignore the possibility of similar happenings in India. We feel, therefore, that the British people cannot discharge their responsibility to the peoples of India unless in any Constitutional provision is made for the ultimate attainment of political power by the masses. The vast majority of the Indian population consists of poor illiterate and as yet inarticulate peasants, who in very many cases are exploited by a particularly vicious system of landlordism and who fall a ready prey to the moneylender. In the big towns and in the planting districts of India there is a large industrialized or semi industrialized population which is liable to be exploited by a capitalist system which is apt to be less enlightened in India than even in the rest of the world. We recognize that in face of the rise of nationalism it is impossible for this country to constitute itself the effective guardian of the weaker sections of the community. We desire however to see that, as far as possible, the Constitution should provide safeguards against exploitation of the masses.

White Paper
Proposals.

13. It is clear in our view that the White Paper Proposals fall far short of what is necessary. Indeed, if legislation is passed implementing the White Paper the Indian people will be saddled with a Constitution which establishes wealth and privilege in power not only at the Centre, but in the Provinces. While franchise as wide as is administratively possible at the present time is proposed for the Provincial Lower House the establishment in Bengal, the United Provinces, and Bihar Provinces where the landlord system is at its worst of Second Chambers designed to give weight to property owners, and the special representation given in all the Lower Chambers to the owners of land and industrial capital will ensure, in our view the domination of the wealthier classes so that political and economic power will be in the same hands. In the Federal Legislature both Chambers are so composed as to be representative almost entirely of vested interests and wealth. Apart from the few seats reserved to Labour and the Depressed Classes, it is practically certain that no place will be found for anyone who can speak on behalf of the 80 or 90 per cent. of the population who own hardly any property.

Safeguards

14. We recognize the difficulty of providing safeguards for the prevention of the exploitation of the poorer sections of the community without, at the same time detracting from the measure of self government given in India. We do not think, indeed, that it is possible, except in a limited degree to place the exercise of such safeguards in the hands of the Governor or Governor General. We believe that what is required is that there should be secured in the Constitution the potentiality of political power for the masses. We are well aware that in the conditions obtaining in India whatever may be the franchise, for a long period the wealthier classes will be politically dominant but we consider that, provided the franchise is widely extended, in course of time members of the wealthier classes may find it worth while to court the support of their poorer fellow-citizens and may thus eventually lead them to a realization of the possibilities of a use of political power to obtain their economic enfranchisement. It is therefore mainly with a view to protecting the poorer sections of the community from exploitation that we recognize the need for safeguards, and we desire that the Constitution should contain provisions which will ensure the ultimate introduction of adult suffrage and which will preclude the possibility of an oligarchy disfranchising the majority of the citizens. For similar reasons, we are opposed to the creation of Second Chambers, and to special representation being given to vested interests such as landlords, and we desire that where representation is given to Industry and Commerce it should be only what is necessary to give adequate representation to particular experience which may otherwise be lacking.

On the other hand we consider that it is necessary that special representation should be given to those classes of the community whose poverty renders them most liable to exploitation. For this reason we approve of the reservation of seats for the Depressed Classes which may have to be continued for many years.

We recognise that special provision is necessary at present to secure in the legislatures the presence of Labour representatives. We hope, however, that this may be only temporary and that with the advent of adult suffrage organized labour may find its expression in the general constituencies.

15 It is necessary, in our view, that adequate safeguards should be provided in the Constitution for protecting the rights of racial, communal, or cultural minorities. The state of Europe to-day provides an abundance of instances of oppression of minorities by majorities. It is unnecessary for us to emphasize the very grave divisions in India caused not merely by the rivalry of the great Hindu and Muslim Communities, but by the existence of many minor communities, and by the division of the Hindu world into numerous castes, and by the existence of the very numerous Depressed Classes. Safeguards for the protection of these minorities are recognized as necessary by most of the prominent leaders of Indian thought. It is, therefore, clear to us that the Constitution, while giving self-government to India, must make provision to see that it is not abused in the interests of particular sections. We have given much consideration to the problem of separate and joint electorates, and, in common with all those who have examined it, we have come to the conclusion that, much as we dislike a system of communal electorates, it is impossible, in view of the grave divisions of opinion in India, to avoid it for the time being. The division of the electorate into watertight compartments and the allocation of seats according to the numbers of various religious communities seems to us to cut very deeply at the roots of a real system of democratic government, but we can only hope that in course of time a realization of their common citizenship may lead the contending communities to sink their mutual suspicions and animosities. Meanwhile, it is necessary to base our proposals for representation at the Centre and in the Provinces on the Communal Award.

16 In endeavouring to frame a Constitution we recognize that we are not writing on a clean slate. The working of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms has powerfully affected Indian public opinion, and it is impossible to ignore the preferences for particular constitutional forms which have now the sanction of usage over a considerable period of years. Any constitution must satisfy Indian public opinion. This is not to say that in every detail Indian views of what is desirable must be accepted, for we have to consider not merely the politically conscious but also those who as yet have little more than a dim conception of democratic government and electoral systems. Nor would it be right for us to subordinate entirely our greater and longer experience of the working of parliamentary institutions to the views of Indian politicians, but it is necessary always to bear in mind that a faulty constitution which will be worked with goodwill by those whom it most closely concerns is better than a more perfect piece of machinery which no one will operate.

17 We accept the conclusions of the Round Table Conference as embodied in the White Paper, that the new Constitution for India must be Federal. We recognize, however, the serious difficulties involved in the attempt to federate units of very different internal constitution, but it is essential, if India is to be a nation, that British India and the Indian States should be associated. The fact that the Central Legislature will be composed of elected representatives from self-governing Provinces, and the nominees of the Rulers of States in many of which there is not even a shadow of democratic institutions, has necessarily very powerful repercussions when consideration is given to what constitutional arrangements are best at the Centre. We doubt whether this fact has been sufficiently present to the minds of Indian politicians. It would, of course, solve many difficulties if from the start the representatives of the Indian States in the Central Legislature were elected, but we recognize that it is impossible for the British Parliament to dictate to the Rulers of the Indian States what form of Constitution they should adopt, and that to attempt to lay down any condition to this end would be to wreck all chances of Federation. But we would like to record our opinion that it would make for constitutional stability and for the growth of a real Indian national consciousness if at least in those States where representative institutions exist those sent to a Central Legislature should be chosen directly or indirectly by the people.

Responsibility

18. The demand of Indian politicians for responsible government has been stressed over and over again and was reiterated by the Indian Representatives who were our colleagues on the Committee. We are emphatically of the opinion that where responsibility is given it must be real. It involves such an amount of freedom from external control as will allow of profitable experience being derived even from mistakes. A form of responsibility where there is power in some other authority to step in and save people from the consequences of their own errors, except in extreme emergencies, is unreal. We have been impressed as indeed were the Members of the Indian Statutory Commission with the fact that under the Montagu Chelmsford Reforms there was a tendency to breed irresponsibility. The fact that in the Legislatures it was possible for elected representatives to vote against unpopular but necessary measures, secure in the knowledge that a Governor or Governor General would be at hand to set things right was, in our opinion a very unfortunate feature of the last ten years. Equally unfortunate, in our view was the constitution of the Central Government, whereby an irresponsible Executive was faced by a Legislature with little power of control. Responsible government in the minds of many Indians is considered necessarily to mean the British Parliamentary system. It is almost inevitable that the long course of education of Indians in English ideas and on English historical and constitutional text-books should have made this conception almost in eradicable. We are conscious that our Indian colleagues have been apt to regard any variation from what we may call the Westminster model of constitutional government as derogatory to their status as fellow citizens in the British Commonwealth of Nations and as conceding something less than they consider is their due. As a matter of fact our own system of responsible government has no exact reproduction outside the British Commonwealth, while there are examples of responsible government on entirely different models, as for instance in the United States of America. We recognize, however the strength of this conviction on the part of Indian politicians, and we consider that India should be given the fullest opportunity of trying out the British system in the Provincial sphere with as little interference as possible. We think it unlikely that there will be uniform constitutional development in all these Provinces, and indeed we think it desirable that the Constitution should be sufficiently flexible to allow of variation and adaptation to the very varied conditions obtaining.

19. We think it essential that real responsibility should be conceded at the Centre. There is no doubt that Indian sentiment strongly demands it and would consider a Constitution which provided for only some slight or illusory responsibility at the Centre as a denial of India's proper status. There is too a further strong argument against giving responsible government in the Provinces and withholding it at the Centre. India has been united for but a short period of time relative to her long history. While the sentiment of Nationalism is strong there are also powerful tendencies towards Provincialism. There is grave danger that if responsibility were conceded in the Provinces and not at the Centre there might be a growth of separatist feeling. The parts would be developed at the expense of the whole and the hard won unity of India which she owes very largely to the British people would be shattered. We consider it is essential the Centre should be as it were a focal point for Indian Nationalism At the present time the Congress appears to very many Indians as the most vital expression of their nationalist aspirations, and it has been a regrettable fact during the years which have elapsed since the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms that Congress has been to a large extent a body functioning outside the Constitution. It is our desire that Indian Nationalism should find its full expression within the Constitution, and we think this is only possible if real responsibility is given at the Centre as well as in the Provinces.

20 On the other hand, we do not consider it likely that the constitutional arrangements for a unitary state with a population of forty or fifty millions is likely to be suitable for a country of 350 millions and, in fact, there is no country in the world with a population anywhere approaching that of India in which the British system has been put into force. We have to recognize that the form of government applicable to a unitary state is not necessarily that which is best adapted for a federation, while, as we have pointed out above, the fact that the Federation is composed of two categories of Federal units of different constitution, makes it difficult to believe that a system modelled precisely on that in force at Westminster would function effectively.

21 We consider that there should be no reserved subjects in the Provinces. We do not think that it is necessary for us to emphasize or enlarge on the disadvantages of Dyarchy which were very fully discussed in the Report of the Indian Statutory Commission. No evidence submitted to us has, in our view, shown their considered opinion to be incorrect. The White Paper suggests three subjects for reservation at the Centre. We see no reason why India should not have as full a control over her external affairs as any other Dominion. She is a member in her own right of the League of Nations. We agree, however, that the department of foreign affairs dealing with the relationship of the Viceroy and the Indian States should be reserved. We consider that the Ecclesiastical Department should be abolished and such functions as the provision of chaplains should be transferred to the Department of Defence. On the other hand we recognize that for some years defence must be reserved. The Indian Statutory Commission stated that the great obstacle to giving full self-government to India was the fact that the Military Forces were composed partly of Indian troops with officers of British nationality, and partly of units drawn from Great Britain. It is abundantly clear to us that it is impossible to transfer the control of Forces so composed to an Indian Minister. This is not due to the fact that the Minister would be an Indian, as is sometimes erroneously supposed, but to the well-established practice, which has never been departed from in the history of the British Empire, that Imperial troops must not be put at the disposal of Ministers not responsible to the British Parliament. We desire, however, that the conversion of the Indian Army from a mixed force to an All-Indian Force should be pushed forward with the greatest possible energy, and we make proposals whereby an informed public opinion in the Legislature on Defence questions should be created. We consider that a definite time should be laid down in the Constitution, at the end of which the control of Defence should pass into the hands of responsible Ministers.

22 In our view, while it is necessary that there should be reserved powers in the hands of the Governor-General and the Provincial Governors, we would desire to see these much reduced in scope on those laid down in the White Paper. We consider that the success of the experiment of Indian Self-Government will be shown by the little use which is made of these powers. It is necessary that the power of intervention should not be used so frequently as to lessen the sense of responsibility of the elected Members of the Legislatures and of the responsible Ministers. They should be essentially for use in emergency, and we believe that in future Governors and Governors-General will tend to rely more on their powers of persuasion and advice than on the putting into force of in actual exercise of their reserved powers.

Administration

23. It has been said that Indian government is far more a matter of administration than politics. This may have been true in the past and even have many elements of truth to-day. There is no disguising the fact of the immense importance to India of a stable administration. There are in India millions of the population who are living in artificial conditions created and maintained by an efficient administrative machine. For example, the large agricultural populations in the canal colonies in the Punjab are dependent on a well administered system of irrigation. It is true to say that the lives of millions depend on this machinery of government, and were it allowed to fall into disrepair the consequences would be far reaching and disastrous. On the other hand in our view it is not possible for an administration, however able, disinterested and incorruptible, to function successfully against the force of public opinion. It is here, we consider lies the fallacy of those who suggest that it is possible to return to the old condition of affairs in India, when the Members of the Civil Service were in fact the Government. Those days have passed, and we believe that the present generation of Civil Servants recognizes quite clearly the difference of function which they now have to perform, and that, instead of giving orders, they now have to persuade and advise. So long as the majority of the educated classes in India were not politically awake, and so long as those classes had not discovered the means of influencing the masses, it was possible to maintain that the best form of government for India was a disinterested bureaucracy. But as soon as the educated classes became politically awake and as soon as they began to manifest their power as they have done in recent years, of swaying the masses, the administration had to work under conditions of opposition and criticism which must in time render all its efforts nugatory. We recognize, however that there is still in India the need for British help in the services, and in this most of the spokesmen of India agreed and we desire to see that those who serve India during the difficult transitional period through which she is passing should have that security and freedom from anxiety as to their status and prospects which will permit them to give the best services of which they are capable, and we are, therefore, in favour of all reasonable provision being made to this end. We deem it essential that strong and independent Civil Service Commissions should be set up at the Centre and in the Provinces, and welcome the White Paper proposals to this end.

The Date of Federation

24. We agree with the Indian Delegates in attaching great importance to the fixing in the Constitution Act of a definite date for the inauguration of the Federation. As they said in their Memorandum, we have in view the psychological effect of such a provision on the political parties in India. The uncertainty that must necessarily result from the absence of any definite date in the Constitution Act for the inauguration of the Federation and the possibility of further delay arising from the procedure of an address to both Houses for the issue of a Proclamation would seriously prejudice the formation or realignment of political parties in India. On the other hand we have reason to suppose that if a definite date were fixed over the parties which are dissatisfied with the White Paper Constitution would probably cease to carry on an agitation on the present lines and would be encouraged to concentrate their attention on the new elections. We attach very great importance to this development, since the satisfactory working of the new scheme must necessarily depend on the existence of well-organized parties, prepared to work the scheme.¹ We are entirely in agreement with this view and for this reason we are unable to concur with the procedure outlined in the White Paper whereby the inauguration of Federation will be dependent on an address in both Houses of Parliament. Nor can we accept the proposition that the coming into force of the new Constitution should be dependent on the Indian budgetary and financial position being entirely satisfactory. We can see no reasons why canons of finance which are patently disregarded by all the leading countries of the world, including our own, should be imposed upon India. India, indeed, has an enviable record in balancing its budget and meeting its financial obligations. It appears to us that, inasmuch as in any event the Government of India must be carried on whether there is financial stringency or not, it is illogical to make self-government depend on financial prosperity. It is particularly undesirable that this should be done in the case of Great Britain and India. Such a proposal seems to us to regard Great Britain and India as creditor and debtor rather than as fellow-members of a commonwealth of nations. Equally, we are unable to accept the view that the bringing into operation of the Federation should be dependent upon the adhesion of the Rulers of States representing not less than half the aggregate population of the States, entitled to not less than half the seats in the Federal Upper Chamber. To agree to such a proposal is to subject the progress of Indian democracy to the veto of a number of autocrats. We consider that the Federation should be established, in the first place, with whatever States are prepared to enter it, and that other States, whenever their Rulers are prepared to accede, should be added. We should, of course, prefer to see the Federation fully representative of All-India from the start, but the entry of the States should not be made a condition of the establishment of responsible government at the Centre.

25 We have been impressed by the great importance which all the Indian Representatives whom we have met lay on the subject of Status. We do not think that this is sufficiently recognized in the White Paper Proposals. We consider it would be well to mark the new departure by a change in the channel through which connection between Great Britain and India is maintained. We should desire that India, on attaining Dominion Status, should come under the Secretary of State for the Dominions, but during the transitional period we think that the India Office should be transformed into a Secretaryship of State for the Self-Governing parts of the British Commonwealth of Nations in the East. The Secretary of State should in our view be responsible not only for India, but also for Ceylon, Burma, and any other portions of the British Commonwealth of Nations which are following the path towards complete self-government. In any event, it is clear to us that the India Office cannot continue to exist on anything like the same lines that have obtained since the Crown took over the administration from the East India Company. At the same time, it is desirable that the experience of the India Office should be fully utilized, and we shall make certain suggestions for reform.

26 In conclusion we would urge that in inaugurating another stage in the long history of the connection between this country and India we should, above all things, endeavour to exercise the utmost generosity. We are convinced that the only real safeguard for British interests in India is the goodwill of the Indian people. The insistence on a number of small provisions, each one of no very great value in itself, tends to spoil the effect of the great advance which has been made. We are profoundly convinced from our intercourse with our fellow-citizens from India that generosity and fair dealing will create generosity and fair dealing, and that the spirit in which a gift is made is as important as the gift itself. We recognize that in India we are embarking on a great experiment. The establishment of a form of government based on the ideals of Western democracy in an oriental country is almost unprecedented. To attempt to give a population of 350 millions a system of government whereby they will have control over their own affairs is almost unparalleled in political experience, but we are persuaded that the choice before us is either to go forward or to fail. It should be a matter of pride to us that we have carried across the seas the principles of democratic self-government which we have so long practised, and that those seeds have borne fruit. The proposal to endow India with self-government is not, as some suggest, a falling away from the great traditions of the past, but is, on the contrary, the fulfilment of the work of all those great servants of India who have gone out from this country and who have laboured to make India a Nation.

We have tried to meet with a full sense of sympathy and responsibility what we conceive to be the legitimate aspirations of the peoples of India. We believe that in the future as in the past men and women of our own race will be of service in helping India forward on the path of progress and that the bonds of friendship between the two peoples will in no way be weakened but rather strengthened by India becoming an equal partner in the British Commonwealth of Nations.

It is our earnest hope that the peoples of India will seize their great opportunity of leading the East along the path of democratic progress and that all sections will unite in a common aim to make the new constitution productive of ordered freedom and social justice for all

PROVINCIAL AUTONOMY

27 We are in general agreement with the proposals of the White Paper for establishing Provincial Autonomy. It is our desire that in each Province a Government responsible to a Legislature should be set up which should have control over the entire Provincial field. We agree generally with the delimitation proposed in the White Paper between the functions of the Provincial and the Federal Governments. The lists of subjects in Appendix VI seems to us to be sufficiently exhaustive and with certain reservations in regard to Social and Labour Legislation, to give a satisfactory allocation.

The Provinces

28 We are in agreement with the proposals in the White Paper to constitute two new Provinces—Sind and Orissa. We have carefully considered the objections that have been raised to the separation from Bombay of Sind, which have been mainly based on the possibility of there being a deficit in the Provincial Budget, and to the fact that the prosperity of the Province must depend to a large extent on the proper administration of the Sind Barrage. We consider however that there is a very strong case that a territory racially and geographically separated from the rest of the Presidency should be given a separate administration. The Governor should be given a special responsibility in relation to the Sukkur Barrage. We are also strongly in favour of the Constitution for the new Province of Orissa, which will we believe do an act of justice to the claims of the Oriya-speaking people. We think that the boundaries of the Province should be increased by the addition of the Jaipur Zemindari. We have great sympathy with the desire of the Raja of Parlakemedi for the inclusion of his state in the new Province, but in view of the racial and linguistic composition of the population therein contained, we are unable to recommend that his desires should be acceded to. We believe that even with the creation of these new Provinces there is a strong case for a reconsideration of Provincial boundaries, and we recommend that the Indian Legislature should as soon as possible after the coming into force of the new Constitution set up a Boundaries Commission to delimit the extent of the Provinces and to decide if some should for greater facility in working be divided. Generally speaking we consider that the Provinces however suitable as administrative units under an autocracy are in many cases, too large for the efficient working of democratic institutions for a people at the stage of development of that of many of the inhabitants of India, although, at the same time we recognise that a Provincial patriotism has, in many instances, already been developed. It is therefore in our view essentially a matter which should be decided by the representatives of the Indian people. We would add here a word as to the proposition which has been put before us on many occasions, namely that no area which is not financially self sufficient should be formed into a Province. We cannot accept this contention. It is a fact that the Indian Provinces and various parts of them differ widely in their financial resources, but we can see no reason why, two areas that admittedly differ in their racial and linguistic composition, should be united in order that one of them might bear the burden of the deficit in the other. In our view, the mere fact of contiguity to a deficit area does not make it equitable to impose a burden on the people of a particular Province. We recognize that it is desirable that no part of India should be seriously retarded in its progress as compared with others by reason of its lack of resources, but we consider that the difficulty should be got over by the grant of funds from the whole of India, rather than that the burden of the deficit areas should be placed on particular Provinces for purely geographical reasons.

The Provincial Executive

29 We are in general agreement with the White Paper in the proposals to abolish dyarchy and to transfer all subjects to Ministers. We have considered with very great care the arguments which have been put forward in some quarters against the transfer of Law and Order or particular parts of that subject, notably the Police, but we think that the reasons given by the Indian Statutory Commission for the transfer are sound. It would be disastrous for British influence in India if, while all the more popular functions of government were transferred to Indian hands, the preservation of order should be retained by the Governor acting through an irresponsible Representative, whether British or Indian. The success of a Police Force depends very largely on the extent to which it is recognized by the people as being maintained in their interests. It would be fatal to the efficiency of the force in the future if it were to be regarded as an instrument of an alien power. It has been suggested to us that there should be some reservation in respect of the Special Branch of the Police, especially in Bengal. The conditions in that Province, due to the activities of the terrorist movement, are altogether exceptional, and we recognize the serious nature of the problem. We think, however, that the evil must be dealt with by Indian statesmen, backed by the full force of public opinion which they should be able to rally to the support of their own government. It is not in our view possible to divide up the control of the Police Force for the Special Branch must depend largely on the co-operation of the members of the force engaged in their ordinary functions of preserving law and order. A doubt has been expressed whether information will be forthcoming as to terrorist activities if the Special Branch is under an Indian Minister, not because the witnesses who came before us had not confidence in the probity of Indian Ministers, but because the informants might suspect that their names might be disclosed. We are, however, satisfied that Indian Ministers will follow the usual practice which obtains in this country and will not seek for information from the Chief of Police as to the names of those on whose information action is taken. We have already stated that we desire to give in the Provincial field the fullest opportunity for the experiment of parliamentary government on the British model. We consider, therefore, that all Ministers should be elected members of the Legislature, and there should be no power in the Governor to appoint as Minister a non-elected person. It has been argued that it might be advisable at some time and in some Provinces for the Governor to have the power of entrusting a particular portfolio to someone who did not owe his position to popular election, and the suggestion has been made that the provision of Second Chambers in some of the Provinces will enable this to be done on lines not unlike those which obtain in this country where some Ministers are Members of the House of Lords. We do not consider that this provision should be included in the Constitution. It is undesirable, we think, that there should be any blurring of responsibility, which must lie definitely either with Ministers responsible to the Legislature or with the Governor if a complete breakdown occurs.

Selection of Ministers

30 We consider that the Governor in selecting Ministers should follow the practice that obtains in this country, that is to say, that he should send for the individual who in his opinion commands the greatest amount of support in the Legislature, and should invite him to form a ministry. We consider that the practice already obtaining in Madras of having a First Minister who is, in fact, the Prime Minister should be followed in all provinces. The White Paper suggests that the Governor should be instructed to choose his Ministry in such a way as to represent the various communities. We do not think that his discretion should be in any way hampered. If real parliamentary government is to be established, it is essential that there should be collective responsibility. At the present time in some Provinces in India the Ministry is composed of Members who draw their support from separate sections and who cannot rely on a majority in the Legislature to support the Ministry as a whole. While in some Provinces such a practice may still be necessary we consider that experience has shown that a system of groups forms a very weak basis for a government, and we should desire that the Governor wherever possible should endeavour to form a homogeneous Ministry.

The Governor's special responsibilities

31 It is proposed in the White Paper that the Governor shall have a special responsibility in respect of (a) the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of the Province or any part thereof (b) the safeguarding of the legitimate interests of minorities (c) the securing to the members of the Public Services of any rights provided for them by the constitution and the safeguarding of their legitimate interests (d) the prevention of commercial discrimination (e) the protection of the rights of any Indian State (f) the administration of areas declared in accordance with provisions in that behalf to be partially excluded areas and (g) securing the execution of orders lawfully issued by the Governor-General. The Governors of the North West Frontier Province and of Sind are respectively declared to have in addition a special responsibility in respect of (h) any matter affecting the Governor's responsibilities as Agent to the Governor-General in the Tribal and other Transborder Areas and (i) the administration of the Sukkur Barrage. With regard to (a) the Joint Memorandum of the British Indian Delegation urges a double limitation on the scope of this special responsibility: first, that the special responsibility itself shall be restricted to cases in which the menace arises from subversive movements or the activities of a person or persons tending to crimes of violence and, secondly any action taken by the Governor under it shall be confined to the department of Law and Order.¹ We accept the first suggestion. We feel that the special responsibilities of the Governor should be reduced to the absolute minimum necessary and that the provision in the White Paper is drawn in such wide terms as to enable the Governor to step in and overrule Ministers over a very wide field. To give such wide powers of intervention is, in our view, likely to reduce that sense of responsibility which we wish to see created in Ministers and Legislatures. We believe that the success of the Provincial Governments will be shown just in so far as such a power does not have to be exercised, and we consider that powers given to the Governor must be adequate, but in our view they should essentially be emergency powers to be used only where a break down threatens and not to be part of the ordinary operation of government. We do not agree however that any action taken by the Governor should be confined to the department of Law and Order. This is to fall into the mistake which may perhaps have arisen owing to the operation of dynarchy in imagining that Government can be divided up into a series of watertight compartments. With regard to (b) we agree with the British India Delegation in thinking that the term 'legitimate interests of minorities' is capable of a dangerously wide interpretation. It may be said that the term "minorities" has a special meaning in India and connotes the Minority Communities such as the Muslims, the Sikhs, or Indian Christians and that the Governor will well understand the scope of the phrase. We fear, however, that it may be possible for some Governor in the future so to interpret the "legitimate interests of minorities" as to make him feel it incumbent upon him to prevent legislation directed to the removal of economic, social and religious abuses, and we should therefore propose that, instead, the words "racial and religious" should be inserted before the word "minorities." We also agree that the words in (c) are capable of a wide interpretation, and would prefer that "special responsibility" should relate only to the securing to the Members of the Public Services of the rights definitely provided for them by the Constitution.

Procedure

32 It is contemplated that the Governor should normally preside at meetings of his Ministers. We realize that for some time this practice may be desirable but we would wish that it may soon fall into desuetude. In the early stages of the new Constitution, Ministers will value the advice of the Governor, but this can be obtained without his direct participation in what amount to meetings of a Cabinet. It is, we think, in the direction of gradually transforming the position of the Provincial Governors into that held by the Governor of a self-governing Dominion that progress towards full self-government will be made in the Provinces. This progress may well be more rapid in some provinces than in others, but, in our view, it is desirable from the start that Ministers should take upon themselves the full responsibility. We recognize that it is necessary that the Governor should be kept fully informed of all that is taking place, if he is to be in a position to carry out his special responsibilities. We believe that this can be fully provided for by his right to lay down rules of business. We consider it necessary that the Governor should be provided with an adequate staff and that the salaries of the Governor and of his staff should be not votable. In particular, it is necessary that he should have a capable and experienced officer of high standing at the head of his staff who would be fully conversant with the current affairs of the Province and in close contact with the administration. It is, in our view, obviously necessary, in the case of Provinces to which Governors are sent out from this country, that there should be available a fully-informed officer of high rank if a Governor is to carry out his onerous and responsible duties.

Special Powers

33 We agree with the White Paper, that it is necessary that there should be special powers in the Governor to legislate in case of emergency, but only in emergency. We disagree with the White Paper in the suggestion that where a Governor proposes to pass emergency legislation he should seek the consent of the Legislature. It should be a condition precedent to the introduction of such legislation that it is impossible to get the necessary consent of the Legislature and for the Governor to endeavour to obtain that consent which ex-hypothesi will not be forthcoming seems to us to be quite illogical. We consider that all acts of Governors and all temporary ordinances should be laid before Parliament and that the Governor, before legislating or passing ordinances, should have the consent of the Governor-General. We are in agreement with the recommendation of the White Paper, that in the event of a breakdown of the Constitution the Governor should have power, by Proclamation, to assume to himself such powers vested in any Provincial authority as appear to him to be necessary for the purpose of securing that the Government of the Province should be carried on effectively. Events have shown that this may be necessary, and we realize that in any event the Government must be carried on. We desire that there should be the sharpest distinction between ordinary constitutional government and the emergency action of a Governor in the event of a breakdown. It is far better, in our view, to make no pretence of carrying on constitutional government where, for the time being, this has failed.

Provincial Legislature

34. The White Paper proposes that in each Governor's Province there will be a Provincial Legislature, consisting except in the Provinces of Bengal, the United Provinces and Bihar of the King represented by the Governor and of one Chamber to be known as the Legislative Assembly. In the Provinces just named the Legislature will consist of His Majesty represented by the Governor and of two Chambers, to be known respectively as the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly. It is also proposed that after a period of ten years 'after the commencement of the Constitution Act—(a) where the Legislature consists of two Chambers to provide by Act, which both Chambers separately have passed, and have confirmed by a subsequent Act passed not less than two years later, that it shall consist of one Chamber instead of two Chambers and (b) where the Legislature consists of one Chamber to present an Address to His Majesty praying that the Legislature may be reconstituted with two Chambers. In our view Second Chambers, as proposed in the White Paper and composed largely of landowners and reactionary elements opposed in general to the wishes of the mass of the people, are undemocratic. We are in favour of one Chamber only. We should like on this subject, to quote with approval the opinion of some Members of the Indian Statutory Commission.

It has generally been proposed in evidence before the Joint Conference to constitute Second Chambers disproportionately representative of vested interests. They fear that such Chambers would be regarded as an undemocratic instrument of Government, and that ceaseless conflict between the two Houses would result. They think that this danger will be a real one, however the Second Chambers may be formed. Whilst a Second Chamber will not be a substitute for the Governor's powers, its existence may be used as an argument for modifying the Governor's powers before this is desirable and it may support the Lower House against the Governor and so increase rather than prevent friction between him and the Legislature. So long as Ministers are secured in the support of the Lower House, and so obtain the funds which they require, the Second Chamber can exercise little control on the administrative side and it is here that the influence of a Legislature is most required.¹

In the Joint Memorandum submitted to us by the British India Delegation they pointed out that only one of their number was in favour of Second Chambers in the three Provinces of Bengal, Bihar and the United Provinces, while another Member of the Delegation considered that only in the case of the United Provinces was a Second Chamber necessary. All the others were totally opposed to the creation of Second Chambers in Bengal, Bihar and the United Provinces.² There are two other arguments against Second Chambers which must be given due weight. The first is the additional cost on Indian revenues, which would be considerable and out of all proportion to the benefit, if any to be gained and the second is the drain on the personnel of the Provinces which would be made by creating so large a number of seats which must be filled.

Composition of the Legislatures

35. We have found ourselves obliged to accept the existing position in India and to agree reluctantly to the continuation of Communal Electorates, and we therefore accept the allocation of seats in the White Paper which are based upon the Communal Award issued by His Majesty's Government on August 4th 1932, with such modifications as have been rendered necessary by the proposal to create a new Province of Orissa, and by the Poona Pact of September 25th 1932. We have had a considerable amount of criticism of the Poona Pact by representatives from Bengal on the ground that undue representation is given to the Depressed Classes. In our view the social and economic position of the Depressed Classes renders it most desirable that they should be given the fullest representation possible, and we consider that the Communal Award, having been made and the Poona Pact having been accepted by representative Indians, it is not desirable at the present time to depart from either of them. We accept the numbers suggested in the White Paper for the Provincial Legislatures, subject to the following alterations. We can see no reason for the provision for special seats for landlords. In the Report of the Indian Statutory Commission, Volume II, Part II, Chapter 2, Section 90, the question of the special representation of landholders was exhaustively reviewed. They came to the conclusion that the landholding interests have in fact at the present time been returned for four times as many seats as were specially reserved for them, and considered that the special protection furnished to them at the present time could be safely withdrawn. We are entirely in agreement with this view. If special representation were needed it should be given not to those who by reason of their wealth and status in the community command influence and power, but to those who by reason of their poverty and low status are likely to find their claims overlooked. We are also opposed to special representation of universities. We know that the Indian Statutory Commission agreed that university seats should be preserved, but with considerable hesitation. From our own experience we find that university seats do not provide a special class of representative differing in any essential from those who find their way into legislative assemblies through general constituencies, and we, therefore, propose that these special seats should be abolished. With regard to the representation of Commerce and Industry and Planting interests, here, again, we consider that the wealth and influence of these classes will always be sufficient to obtain for them adequate representation in the legislatures. In the case of Europeans, where admittedly there may be little likelihood of their being elected from general constituencies, we recognize that, in view of the long connection of the British people with India and the special interests of Europeans, that there should be special representation for them. We believe, also, that the presence of Europeans in the Legislative Assemblies has been welcome to their Indian colleagues as bringing in an experience which has been found very valuable. We think that the representation given to Europeans should be frankly given to them as such and they should not be returned as representatives of Industry and Commerce. The abolition of these special seats will provide for an increase in the number to be allotted to the territorial constituencies and thus allow of some reduction in their area and population. This should, of course, be done with due regard to preserving the communal proportions.

36 We consider also that there should be an increase in the number of seats reserved for Labour. It might be contended that having rejected the claims of the landholding and capitalist classes to special representation, we are not equitable in retaining special seats for Labour. The answer is the same as that applicable to the case of the depressed classes. It is necessary to give special protection to those whose economic circumstances render them liable to exploitation. Increased Labour
Representation.

The Indian Franchise Committee in its report stressed the importance of adequate representation of Labour in the legislatures, pointing out that "the force of Labour is in its numbers," and that "until a further lowering of the franchise secures it more wholly adequate representation in the electoral roll" special representation is necessary, and it quotes with approval the views expressed by the Royal Commission on Indian Labour "if special electorates are to remain a feature of the Indian Constitution, there is hardly any class with so strong a claim to representation by this method as industrial labour," and further "If special constituencies are retained it should be recognised that Labour has not less claim to representation than employers"¹. With these views we are in full accord.

The Indian Franchise Committee recommended that 38 seats should be given to Labour in the Provincial Legislative Councils as against 46 seats allocated to Commerce and Industry. The White Paper has increased this disparity by adding yet another 10 to the latter. Vested interests are also reinforced in the White Paper proposals by the votes given to the land lords. The Indian Franchise Committee further pointed out that the administration of labour legislation must for the most part be in the hands of the provinces and we regard it as essential that the Provincial Legislatures should contain representatives of Labour who can watch over the provincial administration and can represent the legitimate desires and grievances of the industrial labouring class.

We therefore consider the representation given in the White Paper as quite inadequate. We support the proposal of the Indian National Trade Union Conference that Labour should be given at least 10 per cent. of the total number of seats.

The method of securing Labour
Representation.

37. We should prefer that as far as possible Labour representation should be obtained by establishing adult suffrage in the industrial and planting and the large cities. We consider that the more developed administration in those areas would be able to cope with increased electorate, while there is no reason why the franchise level should be the same in all constituencies. In our own country there was for many years a great diversity of franchise as between urban and rural areas.

We especially desire this method because it is in our view far better that the needs of the wage earners should be brought home to the candidates of all classes who would be affected by the existence of a labour vote than that labour representatives should be returned by constituencies of electors segregated from the rest of the community.

We recognize however that this method is at present only of limited application and that pending the introduction of adult suffrage generally it is necessary to provide for special constituencies.

Trade Union Constituencies.

38. Accordingly we concur with the Indian Franchise Committee's proposals for Trade Union Constituencies as a temporary measure. The recommendation was to form these constituencies in the following manner —

(a) To qualify as an electoral unit for the purpose of voting for a special Trade Union Constituency a Union should have been registered for a minimum period of one year (in the case of the first election under the new Constitution six months)

(b) Direct voting where the trade union is confined to one area.

(c) Where the Trade Union covers two or more centres, election to the seat or seats allotted to the trade unions in the particular province through an electoral college composed of delegates in each union in the proportion of one for every group of one hundred voters.

(d) In the varying circumstances of individual provinces seats might, if conditions make it feasible and desirable, be allotted from among the trade union seats to be filled by representatives of trade unions of special importance or of specially large membership.

Qualification of electors.

39. The suggested qualifications of electors to trade union constituencies should be —

(a) Minimum age of 21 years.

(b) Paid up membership for at least six months of a registered trade union, which has itself been in existence for twelve months (in the first election under the new Constitution membership three months, registration of union six months)

They also suggest that a candidate for a trade union constituency should be either a member or an honorary member or an official as defined in the Trade Unions Act, of one of the trade unions concerned, his position in any of these capacities to be not less than one year's standing

40 We are bound to accept the evidence which has been brought before us that at the present time administrative reasons forbid the introduction of adult franchise generally. We, therefore, accept the proposals in the White Paper, subject to what has been stated above with regard to labour representation, with regard to the franchise for male voters. We consider that the constitution should provide definitely for the introduction of adult franchise in the provinces. Power should be given to any Provincial Legislature to widen, but not to narrow the franchise. It should be provided that adult franchise should be in force in all provinces at the general election next following the expiry of ten years from the date of the inauguration of the new provincial constitution. Franchise.

41 With regard to women, we consider that the White Paper proposals will not bring into the electorate nearly as many women as is desirable. We entirely agree with the views of the Indian Statutory Commission when they say "The women's movement in India holds the key of progress, and the results it may achieve are incalculably great. It is not too much to say that India cannot reach the position to which it aspires in the world until its women play their due part as educated citizens."¹ We are well aware of the formidable obstacles which every reformer in this field will encounter, for the position of women in India is bound up with the religious views of the great communities. The development of social consciousness among the women of India is phenomenal, and as far as we can ascertain has not been equalled by any other women's political movement in any other part of the world. The development is the more remarkable considering the impediments which such a movement has had to encounter. Nothing could be more disastrous at this juncture than to create the impression among the women of India that the proposed new Constitution treated of persons of less equal citizenship. We therefore recommend the following modifications in the White Paper proposals for women's franchise: (1) That the application requirements should be dispensed with altogether, (2) That a literacy qualification should be substituted for the educational standard qualification, and (3) That the wives, pensioned widows, and mothers of Indian officers, non-commissioned officers and soldiers should be enfranchised, (4) That the wife of a man who is qualified as an elector under the new Constitution shall be entitled to a vote. We are aware that this will mean a big addition to the electorate, but we are persuaded that it would be unfortunate if a big addition to the male electorate were made now without a corresponding increase in the women's vote. Delay now would only mean an increase later, which would have an unsettling effect on the political situation in the provinces. Women's Franchise

FEDERATION

42 We are in agreement with the proposal in the White Paper to transform India into a Federation of the British India Provinces and the Indian States. This as the next stage in the evolution of the Indian polity was suggested in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report and formed the basis of the whole proposals of the Indian Statutory Commission. At the time when the Indian Statutory Commission reported it was quite uncertain as to whether or not the rulers of the Indian States would be prepared to enter a Federation, but this has since been placed beyond all reasonable doubt by the declarations of Indian rulers. They have, however, significantly declared that they would only be prepared to enter a Federation, the Government of which was responsible. The Indian Statutory Commission pointed out that the formation of a Federation entailed a double process: that of the creation of autonomous Provinces and their reintegration in a Federation. We have no doubt that the double process must be embodied in the same Statute and that A Federal Union of States and Provinces.

the time lag which may be necessary between the establishment of Provincial autonomy and the creation of the Federation should be no longer than that which is absolutely dictated by administrative necessity. We have already set out our views as to the Constitution in the self governing Provinces. It remains then to consider on what terms the rulers of the Indian States should enter the Federation.

The Ruler's Instrument of Accession.

43. The White Paper proposes that a Ruler of a State shall signify to the Crown his willingness to accede to the Federation by executing an Instrument of Accession and this Instrument will we assume, enable the powers and jurisdiction of the Ruler in respect of those matters which he had agreed to recognise as Federal Subjects, to be exercised by the Federal authorities brought into existence by the Constitution Act. Outside these limits the autonomy of the States and their relations with the Crown will not be affected in any way by the Constitution Act. We accept generally the list of Federal Subjects given in the White Paper. We consider that it is desirable that the Instrument of Accession should in all cases be in the same form and should, as far as possible, include a similar list of subjects. We recognize that there may be some exceptions due to Treaty rights and special privileges but we consider that there must be a definite minimum laid down and that as far as possible all States should come in on the same terms.

sufficient number of States not to be a condition precedent to Federation

44. The White Paper suggests that a Federation which comprised the Provinces and only a small number of the States would hardly be deserving of the name. We are unable to agree. We consider that the forces making for Federation are so strong that it is certain that before long a majority of the States, in numbers and population, will accede. At the same time it is possible that there might be some hesitation at the beginning and we see no reason why the rest of India should wait for a certain number of Rulers of States to change their opinions before enjoying responsibility at the Centre. We would prefer that the Federation should start with a very large proportion of the Indian States included in it, but we believe that in any event a start should be made and that it should be possible to build up a Federation by a gradual accretion of States. It is for this reason among others that we desire that the conditions of accession should be uniform and also as we shall indicate later that there should be a definite basis of representation for States adhering.

Differentiation of functions of Governor General and Viceroy

45. We agree with the proposal in the White Paper that there must be a legal differentiation of functions between the Representative of the Crown in his capacity as Governor General of the Federation and as representing the Sovereign in his relationship with the States not adorning to the Federation and to all States in respect of the rights of the Crown outside the sphere of the Federation. We consider that it would be convenient if in his first capacity the King's representative were styled Governor General and in his second Viceroy.

Area of Federal Jurisdiction.

46. We agree with the proposals of the White Paper that the area of the Federation should include the whole of British India, with the exception of Aden and Burma. We give below our reasons for holding that Aden should henceforth cease to be part of British India. As regards the States which have acceded to the Federation the Federal jurisdiction will extend to them only in respect of those matters which the Ruler of the State has agreed in his Instrument of Accession to accept as Federal. We consider that the geographical remoteness of Aden from India and the difficulties of merging it satisfactorily in a new Indian Federation make its separation desirable. Further it owes its importance essentially to its position as a strategic point on the road to the East. In our view places such as Aden concern the whole Empire and should not be considered the exclusive responsibility of any particular member.

47. We give reasons later for our view that it is desirable that Burma should be separated from India.

PART IV

48 We agree that of all proposals in the White Paper the one which has given rise to most controversy is that of giving responsibility at the Centre. We have already given reasons why we consider that this is essential, both as a fulfilment of the pledges of this country to India, and as a condition precedent to the active co-operation of the Indian people in the new Constitution. This, we believe, applies no less to the Rulers of the States than it does to the representative statesmen and people of British India. We feel, however, the necessity of widening the proposals of the White Paper and providing a measure of elasticity so as to give Indians more and more real responsibility for the government of their country. We would here quote from the evidence given to us by Sir Charles Innes, who as a Member of the Indian Civil Service has spent the best part of a life-time in India, in some of the most important Government positions. He gave it as his view that —

The need for responsibility

"Incomplete self-government is the most difficult form of government, it is always, so to speak, reaching out to fulfil itself. Canada in the first half of the 19th century offers in some respects a parallel with the India of to-day. There was an irresponsible executive confronted by a powerful legislature, and Canada had its own communal problem in the rivalry of the French and English Canadians. The effects of these factors were much the same as have manifested themselves in recent years in India. There was a tendency towards irresponsibility on the part of the legislature. The tension between the French and English Canadians increased and there was growing bitterness against the Home Government. Finally, there was a rebellion, and it was only Lord Durham's report that saved Canada for the Empire. He recognized that responsibility was the only real remedy for the situation that had arisen. History is repeating itself in India to-day, and much the same phenomena can be seen. The ferment has been immensely increased by the first instalment of self-government. We have set every person in India who understands the matter at all thinking about political advance. It has become an obsession with almost all educated Indians, and they feel that the honour and self-respect of India are bound up with it. As the Indian Statutory Commission put it, there has grown up 'a passionate determination among the politically-minded classes of all Indian races and religions to assert and uphold the claim of India as a whole to its due place in the world,' and there is in India to-day a real Nationalist movement concentrating in itself all the forces which are 'roused up by an appeal to national dignity and national self-consciousness'. Again, communal feeling between Hindu and Muslim is more acute to-day than it has ever been before, and finally during the last twelve years racial feeling against the British has increased in India. Politically-minded Indians tend to believe that the British are standing in the way of their legitimate aspirations and that we do so because in our own interests we are reluctant to give up our hold on India."

49 We think, however, that it is necessary to point out that responsibility may take many forms. We believe that any attempt to try to create responsibility at the Centre by an exact reproduction of the machinery which functions at Westminster would be doomed to failure. In the first place, the system of responsible government as we know it in this country depends on stable divisions on Party lines and, generally speaking, functions satisfactorily where there are only two main Parties. These Parties should not be the creation of groups formed by Members of the Legislature subsequent to their election, but should represent real divisions of opinion which extend back to the constituencies. In the

responsibility

Federal Legislature apart from the communal cleavages which already make the working of the British system difficult in many Provinces, there is to be a sharp division of the Legislature into two categories of members: one of elected representatives from British India, the other of nominees of the Rulers of States. It seems difficult, therefore, to envisage the emergence of Parties on the lines familiar to us in this country. Two further obstacles present themselves. The first is that, owing to the nature of the Federation, the Members of the Legislature will not be equally concerned in its territory and that the jurisdiction of the Federation will not extend as to all subjects equally over that territory while the other is that the subject-matter of Central administration and legislation provides a rather slender basis for a full parliamentary system. We realise that 90 per cent. of everything that concerns the ordinary citizen comes within the ambit of the Provincial administration. For these reasons we consider that responsibility at the Centre will be developed on lines very different from those obtaining at Westminster. We think that it is not always realised in India that the British Cabinet is in fact the master of the Legislature. This is a result of the Party system, for the Cabinet, though formally elected by the Crown, is really composed of the leading members of the Party in a majority. It maintains its power largely through the discipline of the Party machine backed by the power of dissolution. We think that this power of the Ministry to control the Legislature will not be reproduced at Delhi. Indeed we think that the Ministry will be far more the servant of the Legislature than its master. Under these circumstances, we think that real responsibility will lie rather with the Members of the Legislature than with the Ministers: that is to say that the Members of the Legislature will have to take full responsibility for their actions. We do not think that the practice whereby a Ministry is dependent from day to day on a vote of the Legislature during a Session is workable in India. We suggest proposals which will give what is essential—greater stability to the administration.

responsibility

50 We do not wish to repeat here what we have already said with regard to special responsibilities. We consider that the White Paper proposals in regard to the Governor-General are open to the same objection as those suggested in the case of the Provincial Governors and we make the same recommendations for modification. In addition we do not think it necessary that the Governor-General should have a special responsibility for safeguarding the financial stability and credit of the Federation. It is, in our view, useless to give power and responsibility on the one hand and take it away with the other. If Indian representatives are not capable of conducting so soundly the finances of the Federation, they are not capable of self-government.

Departments.

51 We see no reason why the Indian Federation should not have control over the Department of Foreign Affairs. We recognise that the Viceroy in his relations with those Indian States which do not join the Federation and in relation to all the States in regard to those subjects which are outside the Federation will continue to control the Department which in the Government of India has been hitherto described as foreign; but we consider that in its relationship to the rest of the world India is entitled to have the same control over her foreign policy as that which is conceded to the other Dominions. It may be suggested that, inasmuch as Indian Defence is to be a Reserved Subject, Foreign Affairs should also be reserved; but in our view this is to turn the argument inside out. Armaments depend on foreign policy. India has for years paid for her own defence although the foreign policy of the British Commonwealth of Nations, of which she is a member has been decided without her having an effective voice. We would point out that at the Peace Conference and subsequently in the League of Nations India has had representation as a nation. We consider that this recognition which was given to her as a consequence of the services of her sons in the Great War should be given a full content by conceding to her the same degree of control over her external relations as is enjoyed by her sister States in the British Commonwealth

52 It seems to us a mistake to have a special reserved Department of the Government of India to look after the religious ministrations of the Army and Services in India. Such ministrations, in our opinion, should form part of the organization of the Army and the Services. Whether it is wise to make such ministrations a drain on the revenues of a people of other religions is, we think, a point that has not heretofore been sufficiently considered. The Secretary of State for India, in reply to the Archbishop of Canterbury on the question of reserving Ecclesiastical Affairs, said

Ecclesiastical

"(Archbishop of Canterbury) Will you be so good as to define as far as you can the exact range and scope of what is called Ecclesiastical Affairs as a Reserved Department? (Secretary of State) What we intend to mean by the reservation of the Ecclesiastical Department is the reservation of the existing department, namely, the adequate provision of religious ministrations for the Army and the Services. We do not contemplate any further extensions of the Ecclesiastical Department. That, speaking generally, is the kind of department that we have in mind (Archbishop of Canterbury) So that in point of fact, though for good reasons a Reserved Department, it is a very small matter—it affects only religious provision practically to the troops, the Services, and in a few cases Europeans in certain places? (Secretary of State) Yes. Indeed, it is of such definitely limited scope that I have often wondered whether it is necessary to exclude it by name at all—whether it did not really come by implication within the field of the Services and the field of defence but upon the whole I am convinced that it is better to make an exclusion nominatim, but it is exactly the kind of department that we have in mind (Mr Morgan Jones) May I ask whether it does in point of fact involve any ecclesiastical services for civilians who have no relation at all to the Services? (Secretary of State) It is difficult for me off-hand to give an answer to that question. I will look into it (Mr Morgan Jones) I will ask it when my turn comes (Secretary of State) Generally speaking, subject to a few quite minor exceptions, the answer is that it is intended that this Department should be a Department for the Services and for the Army."

While we are prepared to accept the proposition that so long as we have an Army in India their spiritual needs should be provided for, we cannot see why this can only or best be achieved by the proposal of the White Paper to retain the Ecclesiastical Department permanently as a special Reserved Department of the Government of India. We think it would be very much better to abolish this Department and include religious ministrations as an integral part of the Army administration. We would go further and propose that so long as we have an Army and Services in India whose spiritual needs are entirely different from those of the peoples amongst whom they serve, it would be a gracious act on our part if the necessary expenses were placed on British instead of on Indian revenues. We are in any event entirely opposed to this being included as a Reserved Department of the Government of India.

53 We agree that Defence must for some years be a Reserved Department and we accept, therefore, the proposal that the Governor-General should exercise his functions through a Counsellor. We consider that this Counsellor should form part of a unified Ministry. We recognize the serious constitutional issue raised by the existence of the Indian Defence Problem and the way in which it is met at the present time by the Army in India. So long as British troops are employed in India, whether for external defence or for internal security, it is in our view, impossible to bring them under the orders of a responsible Minister. The Indian Statutory Commission examined the whole constitutional position created by the existence of the Indian Army at great length, and they recognized that it was a formidable obstacle to the development of complete self government. We believe that Indian public opinion is extremely sensitive on this point, but that the majority of the leading statesmen recognize the hard facts of the situation. At the same time we believe that it is essential that the Constitution should contain provisions for the bringing to an end of an anomalous position. We consider that there should be a definite programme of Indianization with a time-limit of thirty years. It may be urged that it is impossible to lay down an exact period within which an Indianized Army would be capable of the defence of India. There may be truth in this, but we consider that it is necessary if the work of Indianization is to be pushed forward with the greatest possible energy that there should be a clearly marked time by which the goal is to be attained. From a study of such reports and documents that have been available to us, we believe that this could be successfully accomplished in a period of twenty five years. We suggest that that period should be aimed at, but that a maximum of thirty years should be fixed which must not be exceeded.

The Barrier
of Defence.

At the same time, we are impressed with the very large proportion of her revenues which India spends on Defence. We do not suggest that this is in excess of the amount needed to maintain sufficient forces for the requirements of India, and we are aware that a recent agreement on the subject of the capitulation payments has resulted in an advantage of a million pounds a year in India's favour but we consider that as compared with other parts of the Empire outside the United Kingdom, India has for years borne, and is still bearing, an undue expense. It may be urged that India's defence by sea is provided by Great Britain but her danger from the sea is a potential rather than an actual menace. India possesses in the North West Frontier the one land frontier in the whole of the British Commonwealth which not only borders on areas which are frequently liable to be disturbed, but is exposed to the possibility of invasion by a hostile power. While we recognize the vital necessity of the safe keeping of this frontier in the interests of India herself we cannot but recognize that the menace to that barrier may well result not from anything which India herself does, but from the mere fact of her being a Member of the British Commonwealth. We therefore consider that the whole question of Imperial Defence and the responsibilities of the various Members of the British Commonwealth should be reviewed at an early date in order that it may be considered as to how far the burden now borne by India is equitable. While we agree that Defence must continue to be a reserved subject, we are strongly impressed with the need for building up an informed opinion on Defence matters and we therefore propose that there should be a Standing Defence Committee of the Legislature.

54. The Federal Executive should in our view consist of the Governor-General, the Counsellor in charge of Defence and Ministers, the number of which we think it undesirable to specify. We consider that when the Legislature has been constituted of Members from the States and Provinces the Governor-General should consult with leading members in order to find out what combination of persons would be likely to command the confidence of the Legislature. He should then submit these Ministers and the Counsellor in charge of Defence as a Ministry to the Legislature for a Vote of Confidence. The Vote should signify the acceptance by the Legislature of the Ministry and thereafter the Ministry should remain in office for a definite term during which period it could only be removed by a definite vote of No Confidence carried by a two-thirds majority. We conceive of the position of the Ministry as something like that of the Swiss Executive. Formal joint responsibility would not be explicitly laid down, as, indeed, it is not in most constitutions, but the acts of the Government would be the acts of all and although the Ministry would be composed of heterogeneous elements it would be subject to the very powerful influence which tends to bring solidarity to a body of men in positions of responsibility. We consider that in the early stages of the new Constitution the Governor-General will preside at meetings of his cabinet and that only at a later stage will this practice fall into desuetude. There should, however, be a first Minister, who will preside in the absence of the Governor-General and lead in the Legislature. He should hold a portfolio without too heavy an administrative content. For the working of the Legislative machine we suggest the setting up of a number of standing committees, some of which Defence, Finance Foreign Affairs, should be statutory. These committees should correspond with the functions of the Central Government. They would meet from time to time during the Session. The Minister should preside, while in the case of the Defence, the official Member would do so. We conceive of these committees working somewhat on the lines of those in municipal or in the Ceylon Constitution. The object should be to bring the members of the Legislature into real contact with administration. We think that the Committee stage of a Bill should, wherever possible, be remitted to the standing committee dealing with the particular function of government concerned. We think that in this way, through a developed committee system, much of the difficulty which has been brought to our notice of State Members voting on purely British India questions will be avoided. It would be natural to remit Bills dealing solely with British India to committees of members drawn only from British India. The Defence Committee would have less control than other committees, such as those dealing with finance and foreign affairs, but would, we think, form a valuable field of experience for members. We consider that at all these committees it should be the usual practice for officials to be present, not for influencing policy, but for providing information. In our view, owing to the subject-matter which would be dealt with at the Centre and to the position of the Federation, it is unlikely that governments will be formed with definite legislative programmes, as in this country. We think that much legislation will come forward in the way of private members' Bills. We have made this general sketch of the way in which we might expect responsibility to be exercised at the Centre, because it is important to realize that the British system is not the only system and that it is itself susceptible of reform in some directions. It is a question as to what provisions can be included in the Constitution Act itself. We would rather leave the development of the Constitution at the Centre to the elected Members to work out the forms and methods which seem appropriate. We attach importance, however, to the provision which will give to the Ministry some degree of stability for we have seen in many countries, where there has been no stable Party system in Legislatures but only a number of groups, the danger and weakness entailed by constant changes of Ministry, and we should desire that at the Centre, from the start, it should not be assumed that because the Legislature takes a different view from the Ministry on a particular point that therefore the Minister should resign. We consider that changes of Ministry should only take place as the result of a direct Vote of No Confidence.

55 We have found the greatest difficulty in deciding the question of the method of election to the Central Legislature. It should be recognized that to attempt to provide a legislative body which shall be representative of a population of over 350 millions is without precedent. We are met at the outset by the difficulty of applying the representative system to a unit of such magnitude. We are reluctant to establish at the Centre a very large body, because we do not think that the subject-matter which will be dealt with there will give sufficient occupation to the Members, while the larger the body, the more difficult is effective working. On the other hand, a small Legislature means very large constituencies in which the problem of widening the franchise may present some formidable difficulties. Our objection to Second Chambers in the Provinces applies also to the Centre, indeed, it is strengthened. As we understand the proposals of the White Paper, it is suggested that there should be two Chambers of equal power and of very similar composition, and that in the event of differences between the two Houses, the device of a Joint Session should be employed. We consider that, in effect, this really makes the Central Legislature a single Chamber, meeting for certain purposes in two sections and makes an unnecessary duplication of representation, which results in an unwieldy body of legislatures. We therefore propose that there should be only one Chamber at the Centre and we accept the proportions laid down for representation from the Provinces and the States as apply to a single chamber

Federal

50 We realize the difficulty in adjusting the representation of the varied States. The proposal submitted is to allocate seats to both Houses and seems to combine the criteria of status and population. We consider that the introduction of status unnecessarily complicates the question, and we would desire to see laid down a definite population basis for representation, though we recognize that it may be difficult to obtain consent to this simplification. In any event, we think that there should be a definite formula which could be applied to every State, so that if, as may well be, the Federation is built up by the gradual accession of States, there may be at hand the means of allocating forthwith the representation to which any particular State is entitled. We are opposed to the proposal in the White Paper that any weightage should be given to the States' Representatives if the full number of States has not joined the Federation. We think that by allowing only such representation to the States side as is proportionate to the number and population of the States acceding there will be an incentive on the part of those in the Federation to work for the inclusion of others.

51 We have examined the proportion of members allocated to the various Provinces, and while we recognize that a smaller Province must have some addition to its population ratio we are unable to accept the differentiation made in favour of Bombay and the Punjab at the expense of Madras, Bengal and the United Provinces. We see no reason why Bombay should be allocated almost two members per million while Madras and Bengal get less than one. We consider that all Provinces, with the exceptions mentioned above should come in on an equal basis. We have considered very carefully the rival claims of direct and indirect election. On the one hand direct election is favoured by the majority of Indian politicians who have become accustomed to it during the period of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, and it is feared that without a direct election to Centre may tend to be merely the expression of the separatist feelings of a number of Provinces and that the danger of corruption is increased by placing the choice of representatives in the hands of so few electors. On the other hand, we feel grave difficulty in the fact that direct election involves constituencies of very large area and with very large electorates even on the basis of the franchise proposed in the White Paper. In particular, as we are in favour of adult suffrage, whenever that is practicably attainable we see great difficulties in its application to the Central Government without creating an unwieldy body of legislatures. We have, however been forced to come to a conclusion on the matter and we consider that the weight of argument falls on the side of direct election. We have already expressed our objections to special representation being given to the landlords, the universities, commerce and industry and these objections hold good at the Centre as well as in the Provinces. We recognize however that there is a case for some representation of commerce and industry at the Centre in view of the character of the questions which will come up for decision here, and we should therefore as a temporary measure, be prepared to see some representation given to those interests. In other respects, we accept the allocation of seats given in the White Paper subject to the following variations —

52 The White Paper proposes that in the Federal Assembly Labour should be given ten seats as against twenty six assigned altogether to the representatives of Commerce and Industry the landlords and the Europeans. We regard this as wholly disproportionate as it would mean that Labour would only have 4 per cent. of the total seats from British States' Representatives.

Provincial Members.

Representation of Labour at the Centre.

India, and that a few thousand Europeans would have a greater voting strength than the many millions of industrial and rural wage earners. As is pointed out by the Indian Franchise Committee, Labour legislation will be predominantly a Federal subject under the new constitution, while the restricted franchise at the Centre will not bring on the electoral roll the same proportion of the working classes as in the case of the provincial legislatures. It is, therefore, especially important that Labour representation should be adequate.

We recommend, therefore, that the seats allotted to Labour should be raised to twenty-six.

We note that according to the White Paper the distribution of seats is to be on a provincial basis. We suggest that this requires modification. Certain trades and industries, such as textiles and railways are distributed over more than one province. If seats should be allocated on a purely provincial basis, certain trade unions would be handicapped, while others would be given more than their reasonable quota of representation. We recommend that Labour seats should be fixed on an industrial basis with due regard to provincial considerations.

59 We accept the provisions of the White Paper for the Federal Franchise, subject to the amendments which we have suggested in respect of the qualifications of women electors, and to our proposals in regard to Labour representation, but we desire to state that we regard the provision as only a temporary one until a means can be found of extending the franchise and of making the British-India side of the Federal Legislature more representative of the masses of the people. Federal Franchise

60 The transformation of British India from a unitary into a federal state necessitates a complete readjustment of the relations between the Federal and the Provincial Governments. Hitherto the Provincial Governments have been subordinate to the Central Government, they are under an obligation to obey its orders and directions, but under the new constitution the representative spheres of the Centre and the Provinces will be strictly delimited, and the jurisdiction of each will exclude the jurisdiction of the other. We are impressed by the possible dangers of a too strict adherence to the principles of what is known as Provincial Autonomy. The Indian Statutory Commission in its recommendations for Provincial Autonomy was, we think, not unaffected by the desire to give the largest possible ambit to autonomy in the Provincial sphere, owing to their inability at that time to recommend responsibility at the Centre. The larger measure of Indian self-government which has obtained in the Provinces during the past twelve years has also, we think, tended to develop, and perhaps over-develop, a desire for complete freedom of control from the Centre. It is, however, clear to us that there are many matters of administration in which the closest co-operation is needed between Province and Province and also between Provinces and States. It is obvious that there may be differences of policy in regard to irrigation and forests, whereby one unit of the Federation may be injured by another, and the Constitution provides for no redress. We do not think it is possible to give definite powers to the Federal Government in these respects, but we consider that every effort should be made to develop inter-Provincial conferences, whereat administrative problems common to adjacent areas and points of difference may be discussed and adjusted. We think also that where there are definite disputes between Provinces, the Governor-General should be empowered to adjudicate on the appeal of an aggrieved unit, and, unless he thinks fit summarily to reject the application, he should be required to appoint an advisory tribunal for the purpose of investigating the report upon the complaint. Relations between the Federation and the Federal Units

SPECIAL SUBJECTS

61. We have already stated that we are in general agreement with the plan in the White Paper for the distribution of legislative powers between the Centre and the Provinces, and we agree that where in the concurrent field there is a conflict of legislatures the Federal law should prevail but we see certain difficulties in the provision that the Federation should be forbidden to pass legislation imposing a financial burden on the Provinces. The matter particularly arises in respect of Labour Legislation.

Labour
Legislation.

62. It is proposed in the White Paper that such subjects as Health Insurance and Invalidity and Old Age Pensions should be subjects of Provincial Legislation. We see serious objection to this, and consider that they should be included in the Concurrent List. While it is necessary that the more industrialized Provinces should be able to legislate on these subjects in the interests of the urban workers and should not have to wait for the concurrence of those which are predominantly rural it is undesirable to exclude the possibility of All India legislation which may well become necessary in order that there should be uniformity of treatment of the workers as between Province and Province and that industry in one Province should be burdened with obligations not imposed in another. Mr N. M. Joshi in the Memorandum submitted by him argued that social insurance should also be included in the list of Federal subjects, but here, again we consider it would be better that it should be in the concurrent list. We consider that in order to obtain an All India Code of Labour and social legislation it is necessary that the Federal Legislature should have power to pass legislation imposing financial liabilities on the Provincial Governments, but that where this is done grants-in-aid from Federal revenues should be paid to the Provinces and also to such Indian States as are prepared to put in force such legislation. It should in our view follow that there should be a central inspection and a measure of control wherever such grants are made. We consider that there seems much to be said for utilizing the machinery of adoptive Acts as used in Great Britain in connection with Local Government legislation. We have to endeavour to steer a course between delay caused by the difficulty of getting less advanced Provinces to agree to such legislation and the possibility of friction in such matters as factory legislation as between Province and Province or the Provinces and the States. The mechanism of the adoptive Act supported by grants-in-aid in return for inspection seems to us non-objectionable in theory and useful in practice.

Residuary Powers.

63. We recognize that among Indian statesmen there is a considerable difference of opinion in regard to the disposal of residuary powers. Broadly speaking the Hindu community is in favour of their allocation to the Central Legislature, while the Muslims wish that they should be given to the Provinces. We do not think that this difference of opinion is due to any real disagreement on grounds of constitutional theory but is dictated by the supposed interests of the two communities and we feel therefore free to consider the matter entirely on its merits, apart from any question of the views that have been put before us by the contending parties. It has generally been the case that in the formation of Federal Constitutions in the early stages centrifugal tendencies have been very strong. These tendencies have in India been reinforced by the fact that a greater degree of responsibility was given under the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms to the Provinces than to the Centre and the Representatives of the Provinces have not infrequently tended to press to an extreme the conception of Provincial Autonomy.

So that, in fact, a Central Government becomes nothing more than a weak and ineffective link between a number of autonomous units. We recognize that the composition of the Central Legislature, representing as it will partly the Provinces and partly the Indian States, may seem to reinforce the arguments of those who claim that residual powers should be in the Provinces, but it has been a general experience in Federations that after a period of time it has been found that the powers of the Central Government are insufficient and that too great a degree of autonomy has been given to Provincial units. We are not unmindful of the danger of centrifugal tendencies developing in India, particularly in view of the fact that some Provinces differ from others in the predominance of certain communities, and we should be unwilling in any way to strengthen and encourage tendencies which would work against the unity of India. We therefore consider that in view of future possibilities, it would be wise that the residuary powers should remain with the Centre.

64 We agree with the proposals contained in paragraph 39 of the White Paper, subject to one change. The paragraph suggests that the Budget "will be framed by the Finance Minister in consultation with his colleagues and the Governor-General." We would prefer that the arrangement of the Budget should be in the hands of the Ministry alone, but that it should be their clear duty to make provision for appropriations required for the Reserved Departments and for the discharge of the functions of the Crown in relation to the Indian States, which appropriations will be taken by the Governor-General on his own responsibility. In regard to these appropriations, we note with approval the intimation that the Governor-General "will be enjoined by his Instructions of Instructions to consult his Ministers before reaching any decision on appropriations for the Department of Defence." We also are in general agreement with the proposals contained in paragraphs 56, on page 28 of the White Paper, and the subsequent paragraphs relating to the allocation of revenues between the Federation and the Units. We further agree with proposals 95 to 100 of the White Paper as to the procedure with regard to financial proposals. Finance.

As we have already indicated, we are opposed to the creation of Second Chambers, but, in any event, we could not agree to Money Bills being submitted to Joint Sessions of both Houses, or, indeed, being controlled in any way by an Upper House. With regard to Federal finance, the White Paper says "the Governor-General, if he is unable to accept the proposals of his Ministers or the decision of the Legislature as consistent with the discharge of any of his special responsibilities, will be enabled to bring the resulting appropriations into accord with his own estimates of the requirements, and if necessary, through his special legislative powers, to secure that the annual Finance Act provides him with resources which will cover the appropriations which he finally authenticates." The Governor-General has, therefore, two justifications for interfering with financial autonomy, (1) the need for ensuring sufficient supplies for his Reserved Subjects and for certain salaries, and (2) a special responsibility for the "safety of the financial stability and credit of the Federation." While the first safeguard is probably necessary, so long as there are Reserved Subjects there should be recognized conditions under which the second responsibility should cease to be operative. We do not hold that the investment of British money forms any justification for special safeguarding. In any event, this should only continue until India has established her independent status as a borrower in the world's money market.

65 We are of opinion that the Financial Adviser to be appointed under the White Paper proposals should not be appointed for an indefinite period, but should have a time-limit of not more than ten years, unless his services are requested thereafter by the Minister. His sphere of advice should be limited to the special responsibilities of the Governor-General, though his advice should be at the disposal of the Prime Minister and, indeed, of the whole of the Government of India. He should not, however, on any account, be in a position to interfere Financial in the normal sphere of the Finance Member. He should be chosen by the Governor-General in consultation with his Ministers. The White Paper places a special responsibility on the Governor-General for 'the safeguarding of the financial stability and credit of the Federation' in order to confer on him powers to step in if the need should arise in the event of the policy of his Ministers in respect of, for example, budgeting or borrowing being such as to be likely in the Governor-General's opinion to endanger seriously the provision of resources to meet the requirements of his Reserved Departments or any of the obligations of the Federation, whether directly or indirectly by prejudicing India's credit in the money markets of the world. It is in order to assist him in the discharge of this special responsibility that the Governor-General is to be empowered to appoint a Financial Adviser. There is no doubt that the credit of India in the money markets of the world is of primary and overwhelming interest to India, even more than to this country. We agree with the Indian Delegates, therefore, when they state in their Memorandum that the Financial Adviser should be an Adviser to the Indian Government. In view of the Memorandum submitted to us by Sir Malcolm Hailey it is a vital necessity that, taking into consideration the heavy expense that is bound to be entailed in setting up the new Constitution with a greatly enlarged franchise, the strictest economy should be observed wherever it is possible, without detracting from the nation-building services. We would suggest that the most fruitful fields for the practice of this economy would be (a) in the Army expenditure, (b) in the transfer at as early a date as possible of the terms of future recruitment, pay etc. of the services to the Governments in India, and (c) in having single-Chamber Government both for the Federation and the Provinces. We think that the Federal Legislature should be empowered, whenever necessary to impose financial obligations on the Provincial Legislatures in order to secure uniformity throughout the Federation in connection with labour or social legislation. We agree with the White Paper that a special responsibility for the financial stability of the Provinces should not be imposed on Governors.

Commercial Discrimination

GO. India has, since the inauguration of the present Constitution in 1921 worked under a convention which gives her full autonomy in her fiscal affairs—without any interference from Whitehall on any matters on which the Government of India and the Legislature are in agreement. This followed on the Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament of 17th November 1919. Paragraph 33 of that Report said inter alia that Nothing is more likely to endanger the good relations between India and Great Britain than a belief that India's fiscal policy is dictated from Whitehall in the interests of the trade and commerce of Great Britain. That such a belief exists at the moment there can be no doubt. That there ought to be no room for it in the future is equally clear.

Whatever be the right fiscal policy for India, for the needs of her consumers as well as for her manufacturers, it is quite clear that she should have the same liberty to consider her interests as Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa.

His Majesty's Government accepted this recommendation and it was intimated to the Government of India by the Secretary of State on 30th June 1931. The Statutory Commission in their Report quote the statement made by the Secretary of State in March, 1931 that

After the Report by an authoritative Committee of both Houses and Lord Curzon's promise in the House of Lords, it was absolutely impossible for me to interfere with the right which I believe was wisely given and which I am determined to maintain—to give to the Government of India the right to consider the interests of India first just as we without any complaint from any other parts of the Empire and the other parts of the Empire, without any complaint from us, have always chosen the tariff arrangements which they think best fitted for their needs, thinking of their own citizens first"¹

In the course of his evidence before us, Sir Charles Innes, who, before taking up his duties as Governor of Burma, was on the Council of the Governor-General of India as Commerce Member, said in regard to India's attitude to the Ottawa agreements

"I think it was mainly due to the fact that the Indians realized that it was for themselves to decide whether or not they would ratify that agreement. In the old days, before we introduced this principle of discriminating protection, every Indian thought that Britain kept India a free-trade country in the interest of her own trade. When the Fiscal Convention was introduced and when we passed a Resolution in favour of discriminating protection, and the first Steel Bill was passed, we at once transferred all that from the political sphere to the economic sphere, and in recent years in the Indian Legislative Assembly more and more we have been creating a strong Free Trade Party. It was getting more and more difficult for me to pass Protection Bills. I think that is all to the good, it shows the value of responsibility, and I am perfectly sure that if we had not taken that action, you would never have got the Indian to agree to the British preference on steel, or to the Ottawa agreement, and it seems to me a very good example of the stimulating effect of responsibility"²

We realize the importance of giving full weight to this evidence on the value of placing responsibility on the Indian Legislature, coming, as it does, from one who is in a position to speak with authority.

The Statutory Commission further point out that —

"An understanding analogous to the fiscal convention has been arrived at in one other region. The Secretary of State has relinquished his control of policy in the matter of the purchase of Government stores for India, other than military stores. The Governments in India in agreement with the legislatures, are now free to buy stores in India, in this country, or abroad, as seems best to them, and the Secretary of State though he is by statute responsible to Parliament, has undertaken not to intervene"³

There is much force in Mr Baldwin's words —

"All the safeguards are being examined by the Joint Select Committee, but whatever safeguards we have the real safeguard is the maintenance of goodwill. If there is not a basis of goodwill, your trade will eventually wither away, and I regret to say that some of the measures which have been suggested and which Lancashire people have been asked to support, have, in my judgment, been calculated to destroy rather than to further any possibility of that goodwill between Lancashire and India which we can get, which we ought to get, and which we cannot do without.

"The boycott has died away by a conviction in the minds of the Indians themselves that we were going to deal honourably with them and keep our word about getting on with the reforms"⁴

The same idea is expressed in the Memorandum submitted to us by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru —

"The best safeguard that Lancashire, or for the matter of that England, can have for trade and commerce in India, is the goodwill of the people of India."⁵

We think, therefore, that the time has now come to recognize in the Constitution Act the right and the responsibility of India to settle her own fiscal affairs as freely as and on a basis of equality with Great Britain and the Dominions.

We agree with the British India delegates in their Memorandum submitted to us that the question of Commercial Discrimination might be left to the commercial interests in India and England who would doubtless be able to evolve a friendly settlement by negotiation. Failing that, we agree that it might be provided in the Constitution Act that anything of the nature of discriminatory legislation should require the previous assent of the Governor General. We think that the formula proposed by the Indian delegates should be adopted, namely that the Governor General should not be entitled to refuse his assent unless he is assured that the object of the legislation is, in the words of the Montagu Chelmsford Report not so much to promote Indian commerce as to injure British commerce or as proposed by the Statutory Commission in order to prevent serious prejudice to one or more sections of the community as compared with other sections.

Disallowance of

67. We think that the provision for disallowance by the King in Council at any time within twelve months of Acts passed by the Legislature and approved by the Governor General is a retrograde step for which no reasonable excuse can be put forward. This power which was formerly embodied in some of the Dominion constitutions was finally abandoned by the Statute of Westminster and we see no need to resuscitate it in the case of India.

Fundamental Rights.

68. We are impressed with the insistence with which Indians of all sorts of opinion ask that a statement of their 'fundamental rights' should find a place in the new Constitution Act. The Report of the Indian All Parties Conference also made a strong point of this. The authors of the White Paper see serious objections to giving statutory expression to a declaration of this character and suggest that in connection with the inauguration of the new Constitution a pronouncement on the matter might be made by the Sovereign. We cannot forget that such a pronouncement was made by her late Majesty Queen Victoria in these words —

We declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure that none be in any wise favoured, none elected, or disqualified, by reason of their religious faith or observances, but that all shall alike enjoy the equal and impartial protection of the law and we do strictly charge and enjoin all those who may be in authority under us that they abstain from all interference with the religious belief or worship of any of our subjects on pain of our highest displeasure.

And it is our further will that so far as may be, our subjects of whatever race or creed, be freely and impartially admitted to office in our service the duties of which they may be qualified by their education, ability and integrity to discharge.

We know and respect the feelings of attachment with which the natives of India regard the lands inherited by them from their ancestors and we desire to protect them in all rights connected therewith, subject to the equitable demands of the State and we will see that generally in framing and administering the law due regard be paid to the ancient rights, usages, and customs, of India.

We cannot pretend to believe that full effect has been given to the terms of that Royal Declaration in India. In view of the fact that it has been impressed on the Indian delegates that no pledges or declarations are binding save such as are embodied in Acts of Parliament we think the Indian plea is sound that whenever possible their fundamental rights should be embodied in the Constitution Act and so be secured to them beyond the possibility of doubt. A proposed list of these "fundamental rights" is given in Chapter 7 of the Report of the Indian All-Parties Conference¹. In reference to these they say —

"Our first care should be to have our fundamental rights guaranteed in a manner which will not admit their withdrawal under any circumstances. With perhaps less reason than we have most of the modern constitutions of Europe have specific provisions to secure such rights to the people"²

They go on very pertinently to say that —

"Another reason why great importance attaches to a declaration of rights is the unfortunate existence of communal differences in the country. Certain safeguards and guarantees are necessary to create and establish a sense of security among those who look upon each other with distrust and suspicion. We could not better secure the full enjoyment of religious and communal rights to all communities than by including them among the basic principles of the constitution"³

69 The High Commissioner for India is at present appointed under Section 29a of the Government of India Act and he has certain powers delegated to him by the Secretary of State for India or the Secretary of State in Council with regard to making contracts. The various Dominions appoint their own High Commissioners as a matter of right without any provision being necessary in their constitutions. We think that India should, in this matter, stand in the same position as the Dominions and that the High Commissioner for India should have an equal status and full powers to act on the instructions of the Government of India without any necessity of reference to Whitehall. High Commissioner

70 We now come to what we consider to be one of the most important points of the new Constitution—the position of the India Office. It is the negation of responsible self-government to have an India Office continue to exist on anything like the same lines as have obtained since the Crown took over the administration from the East India Company. If the Government of India have been an autocracy, the India Office has been much more so. It was said by the Viceroy, Lord Chelmsford, at the inauguration of the present Constitution, that "autocracy is now definitely abandoned". We believe that the time has come to give practical effect to this state of affairs. We should like to see Indian affairs brought at once under the Dominions Office. Failing this, and as a step in that direction, our proposal is that the India Office should be done away with entirely and a new Office created with a Secretary of State for the self-governing parts of the British Commonwealth of Nations in the East. This would include not only India but also Ceylon, Burma, if separated, and other portions of the British Commonwealth of Nations in the East as and when they became self-governing. Secretary of State for Self-Governing Areas

71 We are strongly of opinion that the Advisers of the Secretary of State should not exceed three in number and should be all India's or— in the event of our proposals being adopted for a new Office and Secretary of State for the self-governing portions of the Empire in the East—drawn from such self-governing territories. Secretary of State's Advisers

72 During the three sessions of the Indian Round Table Conference this matter, being of comparatively minor importance, did not come up for discussion. It was one of the matters, however, which the Governor-General discussed in Delhi with the Consultative Committee. There is general agreement that there should be a Statutory Railway Board. We are of opinion, however, that this Board should be set up. Railway Board by the Central Indian Legislature to whom it should be responsible. The Minister who is responsible to the Legislature for the Indian Railways and for the Railway Budget should be ex-officio Chairman of the Railway Board, but we consider that it is undesirable that he should be subject to interpellation on details of administration, particularly those relating to appointments and promotions.

Reserve Bank.

73. The White Paper proposes, in paragraph 32, that a Reserve Bank, free from political influence will have been set up by Indian legislation, before the first Federal Ministry comes into being. If it should be proved impossible successfully to start the Reserve Bank, His Majesty's Government are pledged to call into conference representatives of Indian opinion. We note that neither at the first nor at the second Round Table Conference was the establishment of the Reserve Bank treated as a condition precedent to the inauguration of the Federation. It was an entirely new proposal brought forward at the third Round Table Conference. We understand that the Indian Legislature has already passed a Reserve Bank of India Act, and we venture to hope that the date of its inauguration may be speedily decided, since we understand that the beginning of the Indian Federation depends upon it. Assuming the establishment of the Bank, we suggest that the Governor and Deputy Governor should be selected by the Governor General in consultation with his Ministers.

We are not in agreement with the underlying conception of the establishment of the Reserve Bank namely that it should be entirely free from political influence.

We consider that decision of policy in respect of credit and currency are vital interests of the community. They should not be made by shareholders whose private interests may not coincide with the welfare of the State, but should be influenced by the Government.

In any event it should be made clear that India's currency and credit policy will be decided in accordance with her own needs and not by the influence of external financial interests or foreign creditors.

The Judiciary.

74. We are in substantial agreement with the proposals in the White Paper with regard to the future of the Judiciary and for the establishment of a Federal Court, but we dissent from the proposal to create a separate Supreme Court of Appeal. We consider that the object in view would be more conveniently attained by giving to the Legislature power to extend the jurisdiction of the Federal Court. We assume that if this were done the Court would sit in two Chambers, the first dealing with Federal and the second with British India Appeals.

The Public Services.

5. We are generally in agreement with the proposals in the White Paper with regard to the future of the Public Services but would recommend two alterations. In the first place we consider that despite the strong arguments submitted to us for the retention of recruiting to the Security Services by the Secretary of State it is preferable, in view of the strength of Indian sentiment on the point that future recruitment for these services should be in the hands of the Governor General. Secondly we consider that without impairing the efficiency of the administration some acceleration in the rate of Indianization is practicable.

Burma.

"6. We are in general agreement with the proposals in the White Paper regarding the future constitution of Burma. Despite the conflicting results of recent elections we are convinced that the majority of the people of that country are in favour of separation from India and that the anti separationist movement is actuated rather by desire to obtain a more advanced constitution for a separated Burma than by a wish to keep their country as a province in an Indian Federation.

We have already in discussing the Indian problem stated our objections to Second Chambers and to the continuation of the Ecclesiastical Establishment and we content ourselves here with saying that the same objections hold good in respect of Burma

We also would express the hope that the maintenance of communal electorates may be only a temporary phase in the progress towards complete self-government

The Order of Adjournment is read

The Proceedings of yesterday are read

PART I* is again read and postponed.

PART II is considered

Paragraph 43 is again read and postponed

Paragraphs 44 and 45 are again read

It is moved by the Marquess of Salisbury to leave out paragraphs 44 and 45 and to insert the following new paragraph --

(" 44 It is unnecessary to discuss how far there have been pledges by this Country to carry out a policy of self-government in India or how far these have been conditional, because the Secretary of State on behalf of His Majesty's Government has stated that the reference to the Joint Committee leaves the recommendations it is to make unreservedly in its hands. Nevertheless, undoubtedly a solemn declaration was made in the Act of 1919 that this Country intends to give an increasing measure of self-government to India, and the Committee has been appointed to ascertain how this can best be effected. The White Paper contains the proposals primarily submitted to our consideration, but the White Paper itself has grown out of the Report of the Statutory Commission, and in considering the White Paper we ought to keep constantly in mind not only the facts as the Commission has set them forth, but also the policy recommended in their Report—the outcome of three years close study of the question both here and in India itself

The Committee, therefore, notes with satisfaction that over a large part of the field of Indian constitutional reform the White Paper and the Report of the Statutory Commission are in general accord, and this by itself places that part of the subject in a special position to command the favourable consideration of Parliament. These two documents agree that the time has arrived when Constitutions for Provincial self-government should be established

* For convenience it may be noted that this Part I was never considered, as the Committee agreed to consider an alternative Part I laid before them by the Lord in the Chair on the 24th July, 1934, vide infra, pp 470—491

All amendments are to the Draft Report (vide infra, paras 1—42B, pp 470—491; and vide supra, paras 43—453, pp 64—253) and NOT to the Report as published (Vol I, Part I)

A Key is attached (vide infra, pp 521—544), showing on which pages of the Proceedings amendments to each paragraph can be found

Even if Provincial Constitutions did not have this combined authority behind them it is reasonable on the face of it that the process of the development of self government should begin from the bottom. Evidence has been given before us that this is the wish of a great body of orthodox Hindus indeed it was urged by witnesses that we ought to begin with the development of self government in the villages. Even if the revival throughout India of the ancient village councils may be held to be no longer possible at any rate there is every reason that we should begin as far down as may be in the administrative scale that we ought to construct the units before we federate them and that, therefore our first duty is to develop self government in the Provinces. Moreover it must never be forgotten that the claim of self government of a Province by the homogeneous people of the Province—of Bengal, for example—by Bengalis or Bombay by Mahramtas—is far stronger than the claim of the many varied races and languages of India to govern India as a whole. It ought however at once to be confessed that Provincial Constitutions even if we go no further present by themselves many formidable difficulties. To these this Report will return later. It is sufficient to note at this point that such problems as Communal Representation, Indianisation of the Services, the solvency of Provincial finance, the security of Law and Order and the integrity of the Courts are very complicated and very arduous and that therefore in our view their solution must be tentative the time having certainly not yet arrived when Parliament can safely wash its hands of the problems which even this Provincial branch of the subject presents.

It follows that the Committee must approach the solution of the further problem connected with the Central Constitution even more cautiously. If the evidence given before the Committee be examined it will be found that no answer has been given to difficulties of great substance which are involved in the proposals of the White Paper for the Central Constitution. With these we proceed to deal subject to this preliminary observation. In the criticisms which follow we must not be taken to underrate the remarkable ability of many Indian Officials and politicians of whom there were striking examples in the Indian Delegation acting with the Joint Committee.

The true character of the Indian problem will never be understood unless the essential difficulties which stand in the way of its solution are borne in mind: that is to say the demand for federation without the provision of equality of status in the units; the claim of Indians to self government notwithstanding the lack of personal experience and inherited guidance which handicaps them in exercising the higher functions of government; the impossibility of any real contact in direct representation between the people and their representatives; the profound communal differences which split Indian Society into fragments impossible to coalesce; the novelty of Provincial reform and its necessarily tentative character and the reaction of these upon the Central Government. Unless these fundamental difficulties can be met any federal system in India must be unworkable. No useful purpose is served by glossing them over still less in ignoring them. That is an expedient to which British policy is much accustomed when it is presented with difficulties. We often take refuge in it because we assure ourselves that if these difficulties in practice are found not to work they can always be altered. What is exceptional however and vital in the present case is that once the lines of the federal constitution are fixed there can be no retreat. It is this formidable feature in the problem which throws such special responsibility on the Joint Select Committee—a feature and a responsibility which are not always appreciated by expert advisors who are prominent on Indian reform. There are in particular many supporters of the policy of the White Paper who deal in the widest generalities. It is to be doubted whether some of them got further than the simplest fallacious syllogism. The system of government in India has hitherto been authoritarian; it is admitted that this system must be abandoned—the White Paper abandons it—therefore they approve of the White Paper. The Joint Select Committee cannot be content with an argument on these lines. On the contrary we have been impressed by the general admission that the working of the White Paper policy is highly uncertain. It has been even termed a colossal experiment. The Committee has considered how far the colossal experiment is likely to overcome the essential difficulties which have been formulated above

And first the White Paper proposes that the several units of the federation shall not have equal constitutional status

This arises from the effort to combine in one Parliamentary federation the States in India and the British Indian Provinces. In the words of a member of the Committee "there are two distinct and different forms of government in existence in India, autocratic personal rule in the Indian States and democratic representative government in British India." It may be added that the personal autocrats are sovereign Princes, owning it is true feudal obedience within certain limits to the King Emperor, but hitherto completely independent of any purely British Indian authority. It is no matter of surprise that it has been found difficult to weld together in one federation of the normal type units so differently constituted. According to the White Paper the British Indian members of the Federal Legislature are to be elected. Those representing the States are to be nominees of the Princes. It may be asked broadly how long it is likely that a combination of units of such diverse conditions can have any stability. Illustrations of the doubts suggested by this question are to be found in the papers laid before the Committee. A dissolution of the Assembly by the Governor General would as regards two-thirds of that body, elected in British India, have the ordinary effect. The other third would merely be re-nominated by the same Princes as before—a very truncated form of dissolution. Yet this is no small matter, the power of dissolution in the hands of the head of the State is essential to the working of constitutional government. On the other hand though an Indian State representative would have fixity of tenure as against the action of the Governor General we are inclined to think that he would have no fixity of tenure at all as against the Prince, but would hold his seat entirely at the Prince's pleasure. Certain vague assurances it is true were suggested to the Committee, that once they were nominated these State representatives would not be disturbed by their rulers during the term of the legislature. But it may be permitted to doubt whether if a representative differed from the Prince he would in fact long continue to hold his seat. These however are difficulties in detail, a constitutional dilemma of fundamental importance from which there appears to be no issue remains to be mentioned.

The Federal Legislature must embrace all parts of Greater India, and in the White Paper must take action upon British Indian questions as well as upon those interesting the federation as a whole. The question therefore at once arises are the representatives of the Princes to vote upon issues concerning only British India, with which the States have nothing to do? That perhaps might be admitted as a sort of illogical makeshift if the British Indian representatives were to have a corresponding authority as to the States. But this is not to be so. The Princes' representatives are by law to have a right to which the representatives of the Provinces would have no corresponding authority. The autocratic sovereign rulers of the States would not admit for a moment the intervention of British Indian votes to control their domestic concerns. Nevertheless, their representatives are to be legislators who may have if they please a share in the control of the domestic affairs of British India. There is, it is clear, no answer to the dilemma which these provisions of the White Paper present. All that could be urged, and was urged, in evidence was that in practice there might be established a convention under which the representatives of the States would exercise a self-denying ordinance and would refrain from using their right to intervene in British Indian affairs. How that convention is to be defined was left in the evidence completely undetermined. And for a very good reason, that however it is determined it must inevitably break down. It is a commonplace of constitutional government that the legislature by its votes not only enacts laws but appoints and dismisses responsible Governments. The provisions of a particular measure may interest only British India, yet if it is of sufficient importance for its rejection to involve the existence of the Government, this becomes of direct interest to India as a whole, and it is clear that no convention can prevent the representatives of the Princes from taking part in the critical division. It follows that this anticipated convention would break down in the face of any measure of first-class importance upon which the fate of a Government might depend. Neither in theory therefore nor in practice is there any issue from the dilemma.

As an illustration, Income Tax is a notable example of the relative disability under which, under the White Paper British India would stand. Income Tax could be imposed or maintained upon British Indians by the votes of the States, yet except in an emergency the Princes will admit of no Federal authority to impose direct taxation on their own subjects. Incidentally it follows that direct taxation in all its forms, with one rather doubtful exception, cannot be used for federal purposes, since the Provinces cannot be asked to bear an unequal burden. The fact is that though the Princes under certain conditions are prepared to accept federation they are not willing unreservedly to accept federal authority. The authority of the King Emperor they willingly acknowledge but, broadly speaking as to federal legislation even where they are prepared to accept it they will only carry it out in whatever manner they themselves may consider appropriate. The Princes will take no orders from the federal responsible Government. The federal Government thus can claim obedience to its decisions in some units the Provinces, in other units the States, it can only do so by consent of their rulers.

In considering this subject of the solidarity of the Federation as proposed in the White Paper it is not out of place to estimate what degree of permanence ought fairly to be attributed to the adhesion to it of the States. The right of discretionary secession would obviously be inadmissible. Yet can we say it is unreasonable as the evidence on behalf of the Princes claimed, that there should be some such right retained in case of a profound alteration of circumstances. Supposing the White Paper Constitution developed here after with the consent, say of a passing majority in Parliament towards Dominion status, which is the avowed objective of Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and his friends: what then? Dominion status means a Dominion constitution, which would carry with it the power for India to free herself altogether from Imperial authority. Assuredly the Princes cannot be held to be bound to such an evolution of federation against their interests, which are bound up with the maintenance of the principle of unquestioned sovereignty. Yet it can scarcely be doubted that if the majority of the Indian delegation were to have its way this is precisely the situation that the Princes may have to face.

This question of the right of secession emerged in the Burmese discussion before the Committee, and this is therefore an appropriate place to direct the attention of Parliament to the special difficulties which Burma presents.

In some ways the case of Burma offers less complication than the case of India. But it has a formidable dilemma of its own. It seems that Burma is in reality opposed to inclusion in the Indian federation and therefore her delegates asked the Committee for a discretionary right to secede. This is clearly inadmissible. On such terms the inclusion of Burma in the federation evidently must be barred. But the alternative of giving her a White Paper Constitution of her own, as is proposed, in the face of the comparative absence of constitutional and political experience seems also indefensible not to speak of the economic subordination of Burma to India which forbids genuine separation. Yet this is the solution proposed by the supporters of the White Paper.

There is a further difficulty in the general relation of the States to the federation disclosed in the White Paper which though of an interim character is important. What is to be done in the interests of the States themselves and in the interests of the balance of political power in the federation during the interim period, when only a certain number of them have signified their willingness to join? This problem still awaits the opinion of the Princes before it can be solved.

The second essential difficulty which was mentioned at the beginning of this part of our Report was the lack of personal experience and inherited guidance which limits Indians in exercising the higher functions of government

It is common ground that without the British Army India could not be defended from foreign aggression. It is equally admitted that in the last resort British troops are necessary to maintain order in India itself. The Committee have realised in the course of its enquiry the vital character of British services in protecting Indians not only from external enemies but from disorder amongst themselves. On the civil side Indians under British training have made immense advances in administrative efficiency. Many of them possess great ability and they have shown remarkable adaptability to our training in all the manifold details of western administration. But even here few Indians would contend that their Country could for the present be successfully administered without a large measure of guidance by British officials. Yet as the White Paper stands there is little doubt that the services upon which the vast Indian population depends for their security and welfare will under its provisions suffer serious deterioration. This dependence especially on the side of Defence and Order, appears to us to be inconsistent with genuine self-government. The White Paper itself has regard to this limitation affecting Indians in the higher functions of government, and it provides that the Defence services, together with foreign policy, intimately bound up with these services, are to be reserved to the discretion of the Viceroy alone. But will he be able freely to exercise this discretion? The answer to this question is of deep significance. It must be remembered that the Viceroy in his capacity as Governor-General has to work, as it is proposed, with a Responsible Government and to pay his troops out of the same purse which is alone available to the responsible Ministers for all other federal purposes. However absolute may be the terms in which his unfettered access to this purse may be safeguarded it is evident that in practice the legislature and the Ministers responsible to it will have the strongest inducement to bring pressure to bear upon him, pressure very difficult to resist, in order to help their own political objectives at the expense of the interests of the Reserved subjects. We feel that such a situation is fraught with discord and will invite friction and inefficiency.

This is one of the principal objections to the financial proposals of the White Paper. It does not however stand alone, but it will increase and exacerbate the financial confusion which apart from it may be anticipated. In truth it is admitted that Indian finances at the present moment constitute an insuperable bar to the immediate operation of a federal constitution and indeed make it doubtful whether even the Provincial constitutions can be started forthwith. It has in fact been said by a high authority who is a member of the Committee that the proposed new Constitution will be built on a financial quicksand. It must be remembered that not only does the Indian financial system share the general depression but that the proposed changes are themselves expensive and the expectation of social reform, always costly, which have been excited must intensify the adverse position. This is not denied. The alternative to which these admissions have driven the White Paper, namely a Federal Constitution with delayed action, that is to say passed in all its details but hung up, presents difficulties of its own of a formidable character. No one can predict how long the financial stress will continue, but until the conditions which the Indian problem may present at the end of the period in question are known it would seem to be most unwise to prejudice the future action of Parliament in circumstances yet undisclosed.

But direct financial difficulties are not the only fiscal anxieties in the path of federation. There is one other element in the question of Indian self-government appertaining to the fiscal policy of the future but concerning this Country as well as India, namely, the possibility of Indian discrimination against the commercial interests of the United Kingdom. This of course does not bear upon the question whether Indians are unable properly to exercise any functions of government, though it must not be left out of sight in considering the fiscal provisions of the Constitution Act. In this place therefore we would content ourselves with saying parenthetically that in our view it is impossible under the proposals made to us to provide against administrative discrimination and that if a Central Constitution on the lines of the White Paper were to be adopted we should have to rely for fair treatment in these matters upon the good sense and good feeling of the Federal Government.

The third essential difficulty belongs to the vast size of India and its population and the attempt to represent it in one federal legislature.

The White Paper proposes that British India should be represented in the Federal Legislative Assembly by a system of direct election. The papers laid before us show that some of the most important representatives of the Princes in the delegation were dissatisfied with the method in which the central legislative bodies are proposed to be constituted. It is, however, not necessary to go beyond our own experience to convince us that it is impossible with direct election, in the conditions which prevail in India, for the members of the legislature to be in touch with their constituents or able to escape from the acutest form of machine-made electioneering. That would be true as the proposed franchise stands, but nothing is more certain in constitutional development than that the franchise goes through an inevitable process of extension. The prospect in British India with direct election by what might ultimately be some 100 million electors voting in constituencies in one case as big as Great Britain, only requires to be stated in order to be dismissed. In place therefore of the proposals of the White Paper various systems of indirect election have been submitted to the Committee, notably election of the Central Assembly by members of the Provincial Assemblies.

But this alternative is by no means without objection. We do not escape the fourth essential difficulty in the solution of the Indian Constitutional problem. Whether the system of election is direct or indirect the profound communal schism makes itself felt.

Some members of the Committee had hoped that by availing ourselves of the system of proportional representation Hindus and Moslems might arrive at a fair representation of their respective communities, but we have been assured that any such method as a solution would never be admitted by Indian opinion. Whether the White Paper with its direct election is to be accepted or we adopt indirect election in its place, in any case we must fall back upon the principle of the Communal Award, which is in truth inconsistent with genuine self government. The fact is that religious circumstances in India admittedly are such that a free representative system is unacceptable. In order that a certain proportion of Moslems should be returned to the Assembly electors are not to be allowed to vote except for candidates of their own creed. This is rigidly true of Moslem electors and practically true of Hindus, although it is by the wish of the Moslems and not of the Hindus that this abnormal system appears to be necessary. Under the White Paper with its direct election to the Central Legislature in order to achieve this end an elaborate system of separate creed registers and of differing constituencies is proposed. Some of these complications are escaped if indirect election is substituted in place of the other. But the intermediate electorates it seems must still be separated into two creed parties, Moslems and non Moslems, on the same principle. The consequence of this creed arrangement is obvious. There will never be an inducement to a member to study the interests of any electors outside his own creed. It follows that though indirect election does get rid of many of the fatal objections which direct election presents, it does not obviate the greatest of all, namely the perpetuation of a communal division in the political sphere.

Indirect election has beyond this certain minor objections peculiar to itself. It prejudices the effective power of dissolution in the hands of the Governor-General, not indeed to the same extent as in the case of the States to which attention has already been called, but still substantially because

A minor difficulty is that no provision is contained in the White Paper to enable the Governor-General to have that information which is necessary for him in order that he should know when the exercise of this special responsibility is called for. We believe that certain amendments might be introduced to mitigate the difficulty and to increase this opportunity but at the best we doubt whether this object can be satisfactorily achieved.

There is yet a fifth and last essential difficulty stated at the beginning of this part of our Report which has not yet been dealt with—the tentative character of Provincial reform and its bearing upon the Constitution at the Centre.

What power will the federal government have to guide the Provinces, or in the last resort to enforce its decisions upon the Provinces? In the first place there is vagueness in the proposals submitted to us. It must be understood that between the legislative field under the authority of the Centre and the legislative field under the authority of the Provinces there is to be an intermediate field in which the two have concurrent jurisdiction. It has been argued on high authority that the Federal Government neither could nor ought to enforce upon the Provinces the execution of federal legislation in the concurrent field. We are not satisfied that this looseness of administrative authority will make for good government in the future. But it seems quite clear that the contention proves too much for if the argument is sound that federal legislation cannot be enforced in the concurrent field there will be an equal federal impotence in the federal field as well. In the case of the States, as has been already shown, the federal impotence is even greater because whereas in the Provinces acceptance of decisions in the federal field is assumed, in the case of the States the federal government as distinguished from the Viceroy has no constitutional right to enforce its authority. It is true that the power over the States of paramountcy resides in the Viceroy and no doubt the federal Ministers will consider themselves entitled to put pressure upon him to use this power for enforcing their wishes. That pressure may possibly be effective, though this is a procedure that the Princes certainly do not contemplate. The provisions however of the White Paper have in these respects never been sufficiently worked out. Similarly the whole problem of the relation of the new constitution to the general law has not been solved and possibly cannot be solved. There is not merely ambiguity in the treatment of repugnancy between Provincial and Federal legislation, but also it seems between either and the legislation of Parliament itself. Anyhow as between the Provinces and the Federation something more precise than the provisions of the White Paper are evidently required, though it may be gathered that precision would be very unwelcome to many members of the Indian delegation. In the meantime we may shrink from the vast sea of litigation which is opened up by the consideration of these ambiguities. They illustrate the essential difficulty which lies in an effort to create new constitutions for the units and a new constitution for the federation at the same time.

We must however not be understood to suggest that the Central Government would be powerless, but that it would be powerless in guiding aright the new Provincial administrations. Even if the vagueness of the White Paper were eliminated the federal responsible Government will neither be experienced nor disinterested. It will probably be an unstructured focus of faction and intrigue. Yet in the interests of the Provinces the wise guidance of some central authority is certainly required. We repeat that we do not think the Central Government in the White Paper would be powerless. We are aware that there is in some minds a tendency to pass lightly over the relation of the Centre and the Provinces on the alleged ground of the relative unimportance of the Central as compared to the Provincial Constitutions. It is said that the scope of the Centre is so restricted that even if its conduct is inadequate or unsatisfactory it could in point of fact do very little harm. We believe this to be a total mistake. Appendix VI which prescribes the different categories of legislation for the Centre and for the Provinces certainly restricts the former, but once they are established the central legislature and government, like all other political organisations, will try to develop their authority. No doubt the Provinces in their turn with their constitutions to develop will obstruct the central power where it conflicts with their own, but there will be many occasions in which the two will be combined against the British authority, and the central legislature with its government responsible to it will have, as has been shown in these pages, abundant opportunities for pressure on the Governor General which can be made to subserve the aspirations of the Provinces as well as their own. But they will have no power over the Provinces and no disinterested experience to be their guide, and it is clear that the guidance and ultimate control of some Central authority is a necessary element in reform especially in its early stages. The best chance, perhaps the only chance, for the successful issue from Provincial difficulties will lie in the strength and goodwill of the Centre. Though we are prepared to recommend a far-reaching experiment in Provincial constitutional development upon the lines of the White Paper, we are not insensible to the immense difficulties which will lie in its path, indeed, it is evident that many of the risks to which we have called attention in the case of the Centre will apply to the Provinces as well. But there is one fundamental difference between the two cases. If experience shows that responsible government in the Provinces should be differently constituted, that the proposed safeguards have been misconceived or are useless, it would be possible for Parliament, either using the authority of the Central power, or directly by its own action, to make such changes as in its wisdom it may see are required. But once the Central Legislature is established with its responsible Government upon the lines of the White Paper, short of a catastrophe retreat will be impossible. This Country may watch with dismay a growing misgovernment of the vast masses of the Indian population, and the failure of all the precautions we have taken, and yet may be faced with the practical impossibility by any intervention of its own of making any change. In different parts of India Hindus may oppress Moslems or Moslems Hindus and nothing can be done except at the instance of the responsible Government at Delhi. It may be found that the provisions for the representation of women are wholly inadequate or unwise, as most women's organisations in this Country and in India believe them to be yet if the oriental prejudice of the Central legislature is unconvinced the British Parliament with all its supposed supreme authority will in fact be powerless.

The essential difficulties have been severally dealt with in this Report. The difference of status of the units, the limitation of experience and tradition under which Indians at present stand in exercising the higher functions of government, the impracticability of representative institutions of the White Paper type for the vast sub-Continent of India, the profound communal differences into which India is split up, the necessarily tentative character of the proposed Provincial reforms and its bearing on the Central Constitution. It has been shown that in respect of none of these do the White Paper proposals for the constitution of the Central Government provide any adequate solution or, short of a catastrophe, show any means of retreat in case of failure. Incidentally, we have pointed out the prohibitive position of Indian finance. The Committee therefore must view with grave concern an acceptance of the proposals of the White Paper on this part of the subject.

If, then, these cannot be accepted and the Provincial constitutions as proposed alone are proceeded with, subject of course to certain modifications following on the discussions in the Committee, on what lines in our judgment should the Central Constitution in India continue for the present? That is a question to which an answer is obviously required.

Whilst the federal proposals as suggested in the White Paper must, we think, be laid aside, the federal objective need by no means be abandoned. On the contrary, we would suggest that in this regard Parliament ought to go as far as the recommendations of the Statutory Commission but no further.

that is to say as far as the creation of a Greater Indian Council representing the several units of the States and of British India. Parliament may be again reminded, as was done in this Report of the great authority with which the Statutory Commission spoke in its celebrated findings. There is no question that these were against a Central Constitution to be established forthwith on the lines of the White Paper

Federations come about only when the units to be federated are ready for the process, and we are far from supposing that the federation of Greater India can be artificially hastened or that when it comes it will spring in to being at a bound.

And again —

we do not think that the evolution of the Constitution at the Centre will necessarily follow this path (viz. Parliamentary institutions). It appears to us that there is a serious danger of development at the Centre proceeding on wrong lines if the assumption is made that the only form of responsible government which can ultimately emerge is one which closely imitates the British Parliamentary system. It is a feature of that system that the Government is liable to be brought to an end at any moment by the vote of the legislature.

In other words—It must not be assumed that India must have a Central Responsible Government on the lines proposed. And again—

It seems to us most unlikely that if Britain had been the size of India, if communal and religious divisions so largely governed its politics, and if minorities had had as little confidence in the rule of others as they have in India popular government in Britain would have taken this form.

These quotations it is submitted amply confirm the criticisms in this part of our Report. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that the establishment of Provincial Responsible Governments by themselves would not be satisfactory. It would be useless to shut our eyes to the development of the question of Indian reform in recent years, and we agree with others in looking with hope to the spirit of federation which with the provisional assent of the Princes, has become so prominent. Federal development was, of course, explicitly foreshadowed in the Report of the Statutory Commission. But the Commissioners were of opinion that the time has not arrived when it is possible to decide upon what lines a Federal Constitution ought to be drawn. Our analysis of the difficulties presented by the federal proposals in the White Paper, as will have been seen, fully agrees with this conclusion. Yet we should be loath to abandon federation as the objective. Let us by all means go as far as we can in that direction. In this connection we have been impressed not only by the general attitude of the Princes on this question but in particular by what we conceive to be a just complaint against the treatment which they have often received from the Government of India. We are satisfied that questions in which the States have a substantial interest have often been settled by the Government of India without consulting or even informing the Princes of their intention. It was no doubt such considerations as these that led the Statutory Commission to make their recommendation in paragraph 237 of Volume II for a Greater India Council —

We wish to suggest that steps should be taken now to devise the creation and setting up of a standing consultative body containing representatives both from British India and the Indian States, with powers of discussion and of reaching and recording deliberative results on topics falling within the list of matters of common concern.

In other words the proposal is that the Governments of every Province and of every State should be represented in a Council whose advice and assistance the Viceroy should seek on every issue which is of interest to India as a whole. We desire most strongly to endorse this recommendation.

It will be seen at once how long a step this constitutes in the direction of federation. But this federal instrument does not involve the unanswerable difficulties which we have found in the proposals of the White Paper. There would be no question of unequal powers as between the States and the Provinces. There would be no uncertainty as to the character and position of the central Government in relation to the Princes. Subject always to the Treaties, the attributes and operation of paramountcy are established and well understood. Unlike novel experiments it has the stability of tradition, and it would be through paramountcy and the central Government in the person of the Viceroy would continue to exercise his authority in Greater India. There would be no pathless morass to be confronted of direct or indirect election to the central Assembly. There would be no anxiety about discrimination, no dilemma about Burma. There would be no extra expenditure for offices and officials in Delhi. In a word there would be no reason to delay the consummation of the federal principle forthwith. Finally the Central Constitution would be on simple lines, and simple lines are essential in new development.

And yet the new Council would have a great position, because it would have far-reaching influence. It is true that this influence would only be advisory and it is indeed this quality which obviates the difficulties just recited. It would be advisory but it would be none the less weighty, indeed such an advisory instrument is on the direct road of constitutional development as we English have understood and followed it. Everyone of our institutions has passed through that stage. Many of them are advisory still and even the greatest of them carry the ancient traces upon their formularies. The King's Ministers are still termed his advisors, even the archaic formula in which our laws are enacted has no hint of initiative power except in the Sovereign, and advice still appears in the enacting words as having embodied historically the essential function of the greatest Parliament in the world. This feature of British constitutional development is not an accident, it is because under the form of advice and under that form alone the elasticity can be found which is required for the growth of representative institutions. Arbitrary rules bounded by rigid conditions can never be developed into a living instrument of government, as the growth is developed of an advisory body representing public opinion. Under an advisory method there is no reason to define the rights of an Assembly or the special responsibilities of a Governor-General. The field of discussion in the Council need never be circumscribed, whilst on the other hand the Governor-General need never fear the coercion of a Ministerial deadlock. For the power of an Advisory Council would depend upon the weight of influence in whose names it speaks, and the responsibilities of a Governor-General would be limited only by his sense of public duty.

The Statutory Commission proceed in their Report to elaborate the functions of this Council. They are to have a general scope dealing even with the delicate subject of finance.

“The Council would provide an opportunity for taking the Indian States into consultation about changes in the tariff.”

and indeed about every kind of fiscal legislation. Stretching also beyond specific issues to general questions of policy.

“It may well be, however, that an even more important part of the work of the Council would be concerned with questions of general policy falling within the schedule of matters of common concern.”

The views of the Council are to have access as of right to the Legislature and to the Princes.

“The views formed by the Council would be recorded in a Report, which would include the record of any dissenting minority, and this Report should be furnished to the Central Legislature as well as to the Chamber of Princes.”

and further

We think that some machinery might be devised by which at any rate in important cases these views might be expounded to the Central Legislature and to the Chamber of Princes

So that, as has been indicated above the Princes would be fully consulted on all matters of common concern, which would embrace specific proposals as well as questions of general policy; and thus any legitimate grievance of the past would be fully met

Such is the proposal towards federation of the Statutory Commission. Further than this we do not think it would be wise for the present to proceed. With the addition then of this Greater India Council in the Central Constitution the existing Legislature and Executive, somewhat as provided in Proposal 202 of the White Paper should for the present remain but of course with diminished scope. In the first place the Central Legislature would be deprived of those functions which are to be transferred to the Provinces. In the second place a further limitation would be wise (In this respect again on the same principle as contained in the scheme of the White Paper) namely it should have no authority on the reserved subjects of Defence or Foreign Policy as therein defined. Besides these there is one other consideration which has become apparent in the discussions of the Committee and which if the present Central Constitution in any form is to continue requires attention, namely the weakness of the Central Executive. This has proved to be a serious blemish as things stand and will be increasingly mischievous in the face of the inexperienced autonomy of the Provinces. It will be remembered how in our deliberations the Indian delegates criticised the proposed provision by which the Governor or the Governor General could only pass an Act on his own authority of a permanent character after incurring all the friction of a difference with the Legislature. This criticism seems directly in point as against the existing system of certification. It would conform at once both to strength and smoothness of operation if the prerogative power of the Governor-General took the simple shape of an ordinance to be issued either with or without a preliminary discussion in the Legislature and either as a temporary or permanent enactment as the circumstances may require.

Arising partly from these changes there are one or two other modifications which would be required. It must be admitted that in the circumstances contemplated there might be some danger lest the Executive might to a certain extent lose touch with the legislature and with the public opinion which it represents. To minimise this danger the existing disablement of members of the Assembly from forming part of the Executive Council might be removed. The Governor-General should himself nominate his Council and should have an unrestricted field to nominate his Council either from within or without the Legislature as he should find best for the public service.

It will be noticed that in this Central Constitution as here proposed whether in respect of the Greater India Council or the Executive Council or the Central Legislature it is intended to do without the mass of hampering restrictions which form so large a feature in the White Paper. There are indeed hardly any restrictions which are needed to limit the discussion in the Greater India Council. The same is generally true of the Central Legislature as it will continue to exist except in respect of those mentioned in the present Government of India Act. That this simplicity should become possible is in itself a great desideratum. It is true that the restriction method with all its complication will still be tried out in the Provinces. There would seem to be no other course open to us. But in that case there will be as has already been said, comparatively little difficulty in modifying it hereafter as experience may prescribe. The case of the Centre is much more critical and the consequence of a mistake much more formidable. The real and reasonable safeguard there ought to be not in prohibiting discussion or in proscribing complicated and arbitrary limitations of authority (which are inconsistent with any genuine system whether of self-government or otherwise) but in full freedom for the representative bodies either to advise or to enact as the case may be, conditioned only by an unfettered power of the Governor-General, negatively by veto or positively by ordinance, to secure what the public interest requires

In our view, then, the safeguards ought if possible to be simple, but whatever view is taken of simplicity in this connection, at any rate when we are establishing a Central form of Government from which there can be no retreat, there must be an assurance of solidarity between the Governor-General and his Ministers. The device by which he is conceived as exercising his prerogative powers in the teeth of his own Ministers is, we should think, unprecedented and must surely be accepted with the greatest reluctance. We are not prepared to accept it. In the present stage, therefore, of Indian development the Executive Ministers in the Centre should not be subject to the control of the Legislature. They should no doubt do their utmost to carry with them the support of public opinion as represented there. They may or may not be themselves members of the Legislature, but as Ministers they should be responsible only to the Head of the State.

In submitting these recommendations we regret that they are not in conformity with the views of the Indian delegation for whose ability and position we desire to express the greatest respect. But members of the Imperial Parliament have a unique experience in making and working Constitutions and we conceive that we have an overwhelming responsibility to the millions of our fellow subjects in India, wholly un instructed in these matters, to protect them from the risk of a profound constitutional mistake")

(Having accepted the view expressed in the White Paper that it is desirable to establish a Federal Government at the centre for the whole of India, we have now to consider what form that Government should take. For reasons which we shall explain we have not felt able to accept the proposals of the White Paper as regards the Federal Government, but before stating the alternative proposals which we recommend it may be useful to summarise briefly —

- (1) The present constitution of the Central Government.
- (2) The proposals of the Statutory Commission for its modification.
- (3) The proposals of the White Paper for the composition of the Federal Government.

1 The Present Central Government

The present executive authority in India, both in civil and in military matters, is the Governor General in Council. The members of the Governor General's Executive Council, of whom not less than three must be persons who have been for at least ten years in the service of the Crown in India, are appointed by the Crown, and their appointments are in practice for a term of five years, though there is no statutory limit. The Commander-in-Chief is ordinarily though not necessarily a member of the Council, and in that case has rank and precedence next after the Governor-General himself. The present Council consists of six members (of whom three are Indians), in addition to the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief. The Governor-General presides at meetings of his Council and the decision of the majority of those present prevails, though the Governor-General has a casting vote in the event of an equality of votes, and may if any measure is proposed which in his judgment affects the safety, tranquillity or interests of British India, or any part thereof overrule the Council. The three members of the Council who are required to have been in the service of the Crown in India are invariably selected from the Indian Civil Service, the post of Law Member has for some years past been filled by an Indian lawyer, and that of Finance Member by a person with financial experience from the United Kingdom. An official is not qualified for election as a member of either Chamber of the Central Legislature, and if any non-official member of either Chamber accepts office under the Crown in India his seat is vacated, but every member of the Governor-General's Council becomes an ex-officio member of one of the Chambers and has the right of attending and addressing the other, though he cannot be a member of both. The Executive Government is not responsible to the Indian Legislature but only to the Secretary of State and thus to Parliament, and the Governor-General in Council, if satisfied that any demand for supply which has been refused by the Legislative Assembly is essential to the discharge of his responsibilities, can act as if it had been assented to, notwithstanding the refusal of the demand or any reduction in its amount by the Legislative Assembly. The Governor-General himself has also power in case of emergency to authorise such expenditure as may in his opinion be necessary for the safety or tranquillity of British India, or any part thereof. These provisions secure the complete independence of the Executive, though the Legislature can and does exercise an influence upon policy in a marked and increasing degree.

All amendments are to the Draft Report (vide infra, paras. 1—1 B pp. 470—491; and vide supra, paras. 43—43 pp. 56—53) and NOT to the Report as published (Vol. I, Part I.)

The present Central Legislature in India consists of two Chambers. The Upper Chamber, called the Council of State, consists of 60 members, of whom 34 are elected on a high property qualification and 26 are nominated. The President is appointed by the Governor-General for a period of five years, which is the duration of the Council.

The Lower Chamber, called the Legislative Assembly, consists of 145 members, of whom 105 are elected from Provincial constituencies, on the same franchise as for the Provincial Legislative Councils, but with rather higher electoral qualifications, 26 are official members, and 14 are nominated non-officials, including one representative of the Depressed Classes, the Indian Christians, the Anglo-Indian community, the North-West Frontier Province, the Associated Chambers of Commerce, and Labour interests, respectively. The Legislative Assembly elects its own President, and its duration is limited to three years.

2 The Proposals of the Statutory Commission

The Statutory Commission proposed the continuation of the Legislative Assembly (with the title of "Federal Assembly") and the Council of State, as two Chambers of the Central Legislature, but they recommended a system of indirect election for the membership of each of these Chambers. The members of the former were to be elected by the method of proportional representation by the Provincial Councils, those of the latter by the Provincial Second Chambers where they existed, or failing this by the Provincial Councils. The Central Executive, according to their Report, would continue to be the Governor-General in Council, the only change being that the Executive Councillors would in future be selected by the Governor-General. They further recommended that for the purpose of promoting closer co-operation between British India and the Indian States in matters of common concern for India as a whole, a Council for Greater India should be established, containing representatives both of the States and of British India, to deliberate and advise upon matters scheduled as "of common concern."

For reasons which are set forth in their Report, the Statutory Commission were unable to explore more fully the subject of Federation, and the appointment of an Advisory Council for the whole of India was as much as they felt able to recommend at that time. Since then, however, the idea which they were first to suggest has been further examined and discussed at the three Round Table Conferences, and we ourselves have heard a large body of evidence on the proposals of the White Paper. We consider, therefore, that

It is now possible to go further than the Statutory Commission in recommending the establishment of a central Executive and Legislature, which shall be responsible for carrying out the functions of a Federal Government but we have had in mind that the units which form the Federation will differ fundamentally in character and we have sought to establish a Government which would recognise and be compatible with the continuance of their respective characteristics. We consider it essential that the Legislature which represents the Confederate units should be fully responsible, and indeed the Princes have made it clear that they would only consent to join a Federal body which had this character. For this reason we are not prepared to recommend the establishment of a merely Advisory Council, such as was contemplated by the Statutory Commission.

3 The White Paper Proposals

The White Paper proposes that, as in the case of the Governor in a Province, the executive power and authority of the Federation shall vest in the Governor General as the representative of the King. This power and authority will be derived from the Constitution Act itself but the Governor-General will also exercise such prerogative powers of the Crown (not being powers inconsistent with the Act) as His Majesty may be pleased to delegate to him. The former is to include the supreme command of the military, naval, and air forces in India, but it is proposed that power should be reserved to His Majesty to appoint a Commander-in-Chief to exercise in relation to those forces such powers and functions as may be assigned to him. In relation to a State which is a member of the Federation the executive authority will only extend to such matters as the Ruler has accepted as falling within the federal sphere by his Instrument of Accession. It is then proposed that there shall be a Council of Ministers, chosen and summoned by the Governor General and holding office during his pleasure, to aid and advise him in the exercise of the powers conferred on him by the Constitution Act other than his powers relating to (1) defence, external affairs and ecclesiastical affairs, (2) the administration of British Baluchistan, and (3) matters left by the Act to the Governor General's discretion. In respect of certain specified matters the Governor General, like the Governor of a Province, is declared to have a "special responsibility" and his Instrument of Instructions will direct him to be guided by the advice of his Ministers in the sphere in which they have the constitutional right to tender it, unless in his opinion one of his special responsibilities is involved, in which case he will be at liberty to act in such manner as he judges requisite for the fulfilment of that special responsibility even though this may be contrary to the advice which his Ministers have tendered.

The White Paper proposes that the Federal Legislature shall consist of the King, represented by the Governor-General, and two Chambers, to be styled the Council of State and the House of Assembly. The Council of State is to consist of not more than 260 members, of whom 150 will be representatives of British India, not more than 100 will be appointed by the Rulers of States who accede to the Federation, and not more than 10 will be nominated by the Governor-General in his discretion. The Governor-General's Counsellors, who will be ex-officio members of both Chambers for all purposes except the right of voting, are not included in the above figures; and it is provided that the members to be nominated by the Governor-General shall not be officials. The House of Assembly will consist of not more than 375 members, of whom 250 will be representatives of British India, and not more than 125 will be appointed by the Rulers of States who have acceded to the Federation.

The representatives of British India in the Council of State will to the number of 136 be elected by the members of the Provincial Legislatures, by the method of the single transferable vote. Indian Christian Anglo-Indian and European members of the Provincial Legislatures will not be entitled to vote for these representatives, but 10 non-provincial communal seats will be reserved for them (7 for Europeans, 2 for Indian Christians, and 1 for Anglo-Indians), these seats being filled by three electoral colleges, consisting respectively of the European, Indian Christian and Anglo-Indian members of the Provincial Legislatures, and voting for the European and Indian Christian seats being by the method of the single transferable vote Coorg, Ajmer, Delhi, and Baluchistan will each have one representative. Members of the Coorg Legislature will elect to the Coorg seat, but special provision is to be made in the case of the other three.

The representatives of British India in House of Assembly will be elected by direct election in provincial constituencies, except in the case of three of the seats reserved for Commerce and Industry, and one of the Labour seats, where the constituencies will be non-provincial. Election to the seats allotted to the Muhammadin, Sikh, Indian Christian, Anglo-Indian and European constituencies will be by voters voting in separate communal electorates, and all qualified voters who are not voters in one of these constituencies will be entitled to vote in a general constituency. Election to the seats reserved for the Depressed Classes out of the general seats, will be in accordance with the arrangements embodied in the Poona Pact, which we have described elsewhere. Election to the woman's seat in each of the Provinces to which such a seat is allocated will be by members of the Provincial Legislature voting by the method of single transferable vote, the special seats assigned to Commerce and Industry will be filled by election by Chambers of Commerce and other similar associations, and the special seats assigned to landowners will be filled by election in special landholders' constituencies.

It will be seen that these proposals go much further in the direction of establishing a responsible Government at the centre than those of the Statutory Commission. In our opinion, however the proposals of the White Paper have two serious defects which have led us to reject them. In the first place, the responsibility of the Federal Ministers will be restricted to certain departments, whilst for other departments the responsibility will be vested in the Governor-General. The effect of these proposals would be to reproduce at the centre a form of Dyarchy, which experience has shown to be one of the chief defects of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, and we endorse everything which was urged in their Report by the Statutory Commission against such a course. In our opinion, to adopt the proposals of the White Paper would be to ignore the lessons of the past, and to invite at the centre, where the consequences would be much more serious, the same friction and deadlocks which Dyarchy has produced in the Provinces.

The second objection which we feel to the proposals of the White Paper is that they do not sufficiently take into account the divergent character of the units which it is sought to federate, and by adopting democratic basis for the Federal Legislature they necessarily invite future agitation to change the character of the Government in the Indian States.

At the present time there are two systems of Government in India—the personal rule of the Indian Princes, which is indigenous and traditional and the democratic representative institutions which are in process of being established in the Provinces of British India, as the consequence of British rule. This latter form of Government is still on its trial and though it is the avowed object of Parliament to make such changes in the Constitution as will ensure the ultimate success of this system in the British Indian provinces, it cannot be said that this object has yet been accomplished. The proposals of the White Paper, and the recommendations we have ourselves made for the establishment of autonomous self-governing Provinces, will we hope facilitate the successful development of democratic institutions in those Provinces. But we are strongly of opinion that any Federal Government which is established in India in present conditions should hold the balance evenly between the two existing systems of Government, and should be capable of being adopted in the future as experience may prove to be desirable.

The facts which appear to us to be unquestionable in the Indian situation to-day are —

(1) That both in the Indian States and in the Provinces of British India there are men fully qualified to discharge executive and legislative responsibilities, and that it is desirable without further delay to entrust such responsibilities to those who are qualified to exercise them.

(2) That the low standard of education of the mass of the people, and the presence of acute communal differences make the establishment of any truly representative system of Government immensely difficult.

In our view the chief problem which confronts Parliament at this moment is how to secure the transfer of responsibility to those qualified to exercise it without endangering the safety of the immense interests of which the Government of India is the trustee by premature experiments in a system of representation for which India is at present unfitted. The White Paper makes the mistake of transferring only a qualified responsibility to men who have been selected by a system of representation which bristles with difficulties and which no one can regard as wholly satisfactory. In an attempt to approximate to the Westminster model the wholly different conditions of India, it proposes to establish a Constitution so complicated that even men of long Parliamentary experience would find it difficult to work and which owing to the divided responsibility which is inherent in its proposals, is more likely to provide discord than establish harmony. In our opinion a far simpler and more workable solution can be found and one which is better suited to existing conditions.

Our own Proposals

Bearing these considerations in mind, we may now proceed to formulate the alternative proposals we are disposed to recommend.

We will consider first the Federal Legislature. All the difficulties with which we have been confronted throughout our enquiry on such subjects as the composition of the two Chambers proposed in the White Paper, the merits of direct or indirect election, the basis of the franchise, the representation of special interests, the communal award, etc., arise from the attempt to place upon the general population of British India the responsibility of electing representatives in the Federal Legislature. If we were attempting to federate the self governing Provinces alone, this would, of course, be necessary. Such was the problem which confronted the framers of the Government of India Act in 1919. The Central Legislature then created dealt with British India alone and it was inevitable that having introduced representative legislatures in the Provinces, an attempt should be made to create a representative Legislature at the centre. Again, if the Governments of the Indian States had a representative character in federating them with the British Indian Provinces it would be necessary to give the people of those States a voice in the election of the Federal Parliament. But that is not the problem which now confronts us. We have to federate the Governments of the British Indian Provinces with those of the Indian States. There is no question to-day of giving representation to the peoples of the Indian States, and until that is done there is no necessity to give direct representation to the peoples of British India.

We therefore propose that at this stage the Federal Legislature should consist of representatives of the various confederate Governments. For this purpose two Chambers are not required, and there would be no object in creating two Chambers to represent the same authorities. We propose that the Federal Legislature should consist of one Chamber composed of the nominees of the various Governments. The Princes who join the Federation would appoint the representatives of their States and the Governor acting with his Ministers would appoint the representatives of each British Province. The total number of the Legislative Chamber and the proportion to be assigned to the States on the one hand, and the Provinces on the other and within those categories the numbers to be assigned to each Province are shown in an Appendix. These numbers may require further consideration, if the principle we have advocated is accepted. We have tentatively assigned one-third of the total House to the States and two-thirds to the Provinces. The proportion assigned to each Province follows as closely as possible the lines proposed in the White Paper.

The simplicity of such a procedure is obvious and needs no elaboration. It would avoid all the difficulties created by the White Paper, a consideration of which has occupied so much of our time. The objections which will be raised to it are equally obvious. Those who can only think of Indian constitutional development in terms of British experience, will, of course, protest that such a procedure would involve a departure from the principle which has hitherto been followed in previous constitutional changes already carried out in India. But, as we have already pointed out, the problem of establishing a Federal Constitution in India in present conditions is without parallel in the history of the world, and no precedents are therefore germane. What we have to do is to create a form of Government to which Parliament will think it safe and wise to transfer responsibility, and we can think of no form of legislature to which such responsibility could be more safely transferred than one which consists of representatives of Governments which themselves enjoy such responsibility in their respective spheres.

Under the Constitution which we recommend, the peoples of British India will elect the Parliament to which the Provincial Governments will be responsible, and within the area of each Province democracy will be given for the first time full scope for its successful operation. As we have already said, the principle of personal rule exists in the States, and no one suggests that the States' representatives can be responsible to anyone but the head of their State. The Federal Parliament, therefore, which we propose will accurately represent the responsible elements throughout India, and the composition of such a Parliament would in no way prejudice the continuance side by side of the two systems of Government now existing. There is no ground for supposing that the Central Federal Legislature so composed would not be as faithful an epitome of the actual conditions prevailing in India to-day as the complicated constitution proposed in the White Paper, and there is every ground for believing that it would work much more harmoniously.

The Federal Executive

We now approach the question of the Federal Executive. As we have already said, we believe that there is sufficient material in India from which a competent body of Ministers could be drawn, capable of discharging the functions of an Executive Government. We think that the Governor-General should be free to select his Ministers at his discretion from this material, outside the ranks of the acting Civil Services, and if the Legislature is composed in the manner we have suggested, we see no reason why the Ministers should not be made responsible for it. The Governor-General should be given a special responsibility for the subjects specified in the White Paper, just as the Governor is given a special responsibility in the Provinces, but we do not recommend that a system of dyarchy should be created by reserving any departments from the sphere of the Legislature.

In the Constitution we recommend the Governor-General, acting with his Ministers, would be responsible for the administration of all Federal subjects. The Ministers would be members of the Legislature and would retain office only so long as they retained its confidence. A vote of no-confidence in the Ministry would place upon the Governor-General the obligation to appoint other Ministers who would be acceptable to the Legislature, and the power of dissolving the Legislature would, of course, rest with him.

These proposals may appear unacceptable at first sight to those whose minds have hitherto travelled along the lines of British Parliamentary procedure, but if the actual conditions in India are studied, we believe that such a Federal Constitution as we have suggested will be found more suitable to those conditions as they now exist, than the complicated proposals of the White Paper. At the same time, it would be capable of development from time to time as circumstances required. Once the practice of Parliamentary Government had been established, the process of increasing the representative character of the Central Legislature could be undertaken gradually as experience proved its justification.

The main difference between our proposals and those of the White Paper is that the White Paper would establish a Legislature which professed to be fully representative of the people of British India, and would withhold from it full responsibility for all Federal subjects, whereas we would establish a Legislature which did not profess to represent the people but did represent the Governments of all the units of Federation and to that Legislature we would accord full responsibility. The White Paper would look to the future to increase the responsibility of the Legislature—we would look to the future to increase its representative character. We believe that our proposals would better accord with the known facts of the situation, for India to-day is ready for responsibility it is not ready for popular representation. We would accord at once recognition of what is available and leave to the future the gradual realisation of conditions which only time and experience can produce. The White Paper asks India to wait till to-morrow for the responsibility she is capable of realising to-day and offers her to-day the outward form of a representative system which cannot be made real and effective for many years to come.

It is moved by the Marquess of Salisbury Page 22, line 20, after ("White Paper,") to insert ("except to the extent of certain special powers conferred upon the Governor-General")

The amendment, by leave of the Committee, is withdrawn.

Paragraphs 47 to 50 are again read and postponed

Paragraph 51 is again read

It is moved by the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst Page 24, line 38, to leave out ("device") and to insert ("method").

The same is agreed to

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow on behalf of Sir Austen Chamberlain Line 40 to leave out ("to")

The same is agreed to

All amendments are to the Draft Report (vide infra, paras 1—42B, pp 470—491, and vide supra, paras 43—453, pp 64—253) and NOT to the Report as published (Vol I, Part I)

A Key is attached (vide infra, pp 521—544), showing on which pages of the Proceedings amendments to each paragraph can be found

Paragraph 51 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 51 is postponed.

Paragraph 52 is again read and postponed.

Paragraph 53 is again read.

The following amendments are laid before the Committee.

Sir John Wardlaw Milne to move. Page 25 lines 21 and 22 to leave out from the beginning of the paragraph to (We) in line 23 and to insert (Although we do not regard this plan as in any way ideal and would have preferred to avoid it, we believe it to be the only solution possible in the present conditions in India and we therefore accept it.)

Sir John Wardlaw Milne to move. Page 25, lines 28 and 29 to leave out from (Provinces) in line 28 to the end of line 29

The consideration of the said amendments is postponed.

It is moved by Mr Attlee and Mr Morgan Jones. Page 25 lines 21 to 49 to leave out from (one) in line 21 to the end of the paragraph and to insert (We do not think that this difference of opinion is due to any real disagreement on grounds of constitutional theory but is dictated by the supposed interests of the two communities, and we feel, therefore, free to consider the matter entirely on its merits, apart from any question of the views that have been put before us by the contending parties. It has generally been the case that in the formation of Federal Constitutions in the early stages centrifugal tendencies have been very strong. These tendencies have in India been reinforced by the fact that a greater degree of responsibility was given under the Montagu-Chelmsford " Reforms to the Provinces than to the Centre, and the Representatives of the Provinces have not infrequently tended to press to an extreme the conception of Provincial Autonomy. So that, in fact, a Central Government becomes nothing more than a weak and ineffective link between a number of autonomous units. We recognise that the composition of the Central Legislature, representing as it will partly the Provinces and partly the Indian States, may seem to reinforce the arguments of those who claim that residuary powers should be in the Provinces but it has been a general experience in Federations that after a period of time it has been found that the powers of the Central Government are insufficient and that too great a degree of autonomy has been given to Provincial units. We are not unmindful of the danger of centrifugal tendencies developing in India, particularly in view of the fact that some Provinces differ from others in the predominance of certain communities, and we should be unwilling in any way to strengthen and encourage tendencies which would work against the unity of India. We therefore consider that in view of future possibilities, it would be wise that the residuary powers should " remain with the Centre.)

The same is disagreed to

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Page 25 to leave out paragraph 53 and to insert the following new paragraph —

(" 53. This scheme of allocation of powers has obvious disadvantages. It will be observed that, for the purpose of reducing the residuary powers to the smallest possible compass, the lists of subjects dealt with in all three Lists are necessarily of great length and complexity whereas (apart from the question of the Concurrent List) if it had been possible to allocate residuary legislative powers to e.g. the Provinces, only a list of Central powers would have been required with a provision to the effect that the legislative powers of the Provinces extended to all powers not expressly allocated to the Centre, and conversely, if the residue had been allocated to the Centre. This broadly is the plan which has been adopted in Canada and Australia, the residuary powers being vested, in the case of Canada, in the Dominion Legislature, and, in the case of Australia, in the Legislatures of the States. Even so, experience has unhappily shown that it has been impossible to avoid much litigation on the question whether legislation on a particular subject falls within the competence of one Legislature or the other, and it seems clear that the attempt made in the White Paper to allocate powers over the whole field of legislation by the expedient of specific enumeration must tend considerably to increase the danger of litigation by multiplying points of possible inconsistency")

The same is agreed to

New paragraph 53 is again read

The further consideration of paragraph 53 is postponed

Paragraph 54 is again read

It is moved by The Lord Eustace Percy Page 26, to leave out paragraph 54 and to insert the following new paragraph —

(" 54 On the other hand, there are two grounds on which the White Paper scheme may be defended, one of immediate political expediency and the other of constitutional substance. On the first point, we gather from our discussions with the Indian delegates that a profound cleavage of opinion exists in India with regard to the allocation of the residuary legislative powers, one school of thought, mainly Hindu, holding as a matter of principle that these powers should be allocated to the Centre, and the other, mainly Muhammadan, holding not less strongly that they should be allocated to the Provinces. Where apparently irreconcilable difference of opinion thus exists between the great Indian communities on a matter which both of them appear to regard as one of principle, the proposals of His Majesty's Government may be defended as a reasonable compromise. On the point of constitutional substance, it seems to us that, if a choice were to be made between the two alternative principles to which we have just drawn attention, the logical conclusion of the proposals in the White Paper would be the allocation of all residuary legislative powers to the Provincial Legislatures, but this solution would, we think, require to be accompanied by the insertion in List I of some general over-riding power of central legislation in matters of All-India concern, since a new subject of Legislation cannot be left to fall automatically into the Provincial field, irrespective of its national implications. But it is precisely an over-riding clause of this kind which has led to litigation in other non-unitary States. On the whole, therefore, we are unwilling to recommend an alteration of the White Paper proposal in a field in which experience shows that no wholly satisfactory solution is possible").

We think it unlikely that further inquiry will elicit new facts or arguments. We therefore recommend that the boundaries of the new Province should be those laid down in the White Paper with the addition of the Jeypore Zemindary)

The amendment, by leave of the Committee is withdrawn.

It is moved by Mr Attlee and Mr Morgan Jones Page 29 lines 9 to 14 to leave out from (determine) in line 9 to the end of the paragraph and to insert (We believe that even with the creation of these new Provinces there is a strong case for a reconsideration of Provincial boundaries, and we recommend that the Indian Legislature should as soon as possible after the coming into force of the new Constitution set up a Boundaries Commission to delimit the extent of the Provinces and to decide if some should, for " greater facility in working, be divided. Generally speaking, we consider " that the Provinces, however suitable as administrative units under an autocracy are, in many cases, too large for the efficient working of democratic " institutions for a people at the stage of development of that of many of the " inhabitants of India although at the same time, we recognise that a " Provincial patriotism has, in many instances already been developed. It is " therefore in our view essentially a matter which should be decided by the " representative of the Indian people. We would add here a word as to the " proposition which has been put before us on many occasions, namely that " no area which is not financially self sufficient should be formed into a " Province We cannot accept this contention. It is a fact that the Indian " Provinces and various parts of them differ widely in their financial resources, " but we can see no reason why two areas that admittedly differ in their racial " and linguistic composition, should be united in order that one of them might " bear the burden of the deficit in the other In our view the mere fact of " contiguity to a deficit area does not make it equitable to impose a burden " on the people of a particular Province. We recognise that it is desirable " that no part of India should be seriously retarded in its progress as compared " with others by reason of its lack of resources, but we consider that the " difficulty should be got over by the grant of funds from the whole of India, " rather than that the burden of the deficit areas should be placed on particular " Provinces for purely geographical reasons.)

Paragraph 61 is again read

The further consideration of paragraph 61 is postponed

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Page 29, after paragraph 61, to insert the following new paragraph —

("61A If effect is given to our recommendations, there will be in India eleven autonomous Provinces Of these the area of Bengal is approximately 78,000 square miles, and its population approximately 50,000,000, the corresponding figures for Madras are 136,000, and 45,000,000, for Bombay (excluding Sind) 77,000, and 18,000,000, for the United Provinces 106,000, and 48,000,000, for the Punjab 99,000, and 24,000,000 It is over these immense areas and populations that Indians will in future be responsible for every function of civil government in the provincial sphere The area of Great Britain is 89,000 square miles, with a population of 43,000,000, of France 212,000 square miles, with a population of 42,000,000, of Italy 120,000 square miles, with a population of 42,000,000 We make these comparisons because they illustrate the scope which will be afforded to Indian statesmen by the grant of responsible government in the provincial field, as well as the burden which in every Province will fall upon Indians in both Legislatures and Governments It is no doubt natural that the attention of political opinion in India should at the time of our enquiry be concentrated rather upon the question of responsibility at the Centre, and we think that it is therefore all the more important that we should in this place emphasise the magnitude of the constitutional advance which we contemplate in the Provinces and emphasise the extent of the opportunity thus presented to Indians to justify in the service of their respective Provinces their claim for self-government")

Paragraph 71 is again read

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy and the Earl of Derby Page 33, to leave out paragraph 71 and to insert the following new paragraph — ("71 We have already pointed out that, in the present Government of India Act, there is a provision which requires the Governor to be Relations between Governor and Ministers, guided by the advice of his Ministers in all matters relating to transferred subjects, unless he sees sufficient cause to dissent from their opinion. The White Paper as we read it, does not propose that the Constitution Act itself shall contain any provisions on this subject. The Act will commit certain matters to the Governor's sole discretion, such for instance, as his power of veto over legislation and the regulation of matters relating to the administration of excluded areas. It will also contain a declaration that certain special responsibilities are to rest upon the Governor. For the rest, it will provide that the Governor shall have a Council of Ministers to aid and advise him, but his relations with his Ministers are left to be determined wholly by the Instrument of Instructions. We agree that it is desirable that the Governor's special responsibilities, over and above the matters which are committed to his sole discretion, should be laid down in the Act itself rather than that they should be left to be enumerated thereafter in the Instrument of Instructions. In the first place, Indian public opinion will thereby be assured that the discretionary powers of the Governor to dissent from his Ministers' advice is not intended to be unlimited and secondly the right will thereby be secured to Parliament to consider and debate the scope of the Governor's powers before the Constitution Bill passes finally from their control. On the other hand we agree that it would be undesirable to seek to define the Governor's relations with his Ministers by imposing a statutory obligation upon him to be guided by their advice, since to do so would be to convert a constitutional convention into a rule of law and thus, perhaps to bring it within the cognizance of the courts.)

It is moved by Mr Morgan Jones and Mr Attlee Page 35, lines 37 to 42, to leave out from ("suggestions") in line 37 to the end of the sentence and to insert ("We feel that the special responsibilities of the Governor should be reduced to the absolute minimum necessary, and that the provision in the White Paper is drawn in such wide terms as to enable the Governor to stop in and overrule ministers over a very wide field To give such wide powers of intervention is, in our view, likely to reduce that sense of responsibility which we wish to see created in Ministers and Legislatures We believe that the success of the Provincial Governments will be shown just in so far as such a power does not have to be exercised, and we consider that powers given to the Governor must be adequate, but in our view they should essentially be emergency powers to be used only where a breakdown threatens and not to be part of the ordinary operation of government")

The same is disagreed to

It is moved by Mr Morgan Jones and Mr Attlee Pages 35 and 36, to leave out from ("draw") in line 42, page 35, to ("With") in line 6, page 36, and to insert ("We do not agree, however, that any action taken by the Governor should be confined to the department of law and order This is to fall into the mistake, which may perhaps have arisen owing to the operation of dyarchy, in imagining that Government can be divided up into a series of water-tight compartments")

The same is disagreed to

It is moved by Mr Attlee and Mr Morgan Jones Page 36, lines 14 to 25 to leave out from ("formula") in line 14 to the end of line 25 and to insert ("With regard to the word 'minorities,' we agree with the British Indian Delegation in thinking that it is capable of a dangerously wide interpretation. It may be said that the term 'minorities' has a special meaning in India and connotes the Minority Communities such as the Muslims, the Sikhs, or the Indian Christians, and that the Governor will well understand the scope of the phrase We fear, however, that it may be possible for some Governor in the future so to interpret the word as to make him feel it incumbent upon him to prevent legislation directed to the removal of economic, social and religious abuses, and we therefore propose that the words 'racial and religious' should be inserted before the word 'minorities'")

The same is disagreed to

It is moved by the Lord Ker (M Lothian) Page 36, line 22, after "protection" to insert ("especially in cases where, as under the proviso to proposal 122 of the White Paper, an appeal to the Courts for redress against legislative discrimination based on religion, descent, caste, colour or place of birth, is precluded by the Constitution")

The amendment, by leave of the Committee, is withdrawn

The same is agreed to.

Paragraph 77 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 77 is postponed.

Paragraph 78 is again read and postponed.

Paragraph 79 is again read.

It is moved by Mr Butler and Sir Samuel Hoare Page 37 lines 23 to 26 to leave out from (the) in line 23 to (makes) in line 26 and to insert (' Governor's responsibilities within the administered districts of his Province and the responsibilities of the Governor-General exercised through the person of the Governor in his other capacity as Agent General for the Tribal Tracts on the borders of the Province)

The same is agreed to.

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 37 after line 31 to insert the following new sub paragraph —

(But in our opinion, the two proposals in the White Paper which have reference to special circumstances in particular Provinces do not exhaust the requirements of this kind. It has come to our notice that, under the system of joint administration of the Districts known as the Berars with the Central Provinces which has obtained for many years, and which as we have already pointed out will continue under the new Constitution, there has been a tendency on the part of the inhabitants of the Berars, and of their representatives in the Legislature to criticise the apportionment between the two areas forming the joint Province as favouring unduly the Central Provinces area to the disadvantage of the Berars. We express no opinion as to the justification for such criticisms, but it is evident that under a system of responsible government, the scope for grievances on this account may well be increased. We think therefore that the Governor of the joint Province should have imposed upon him a special responsibility and should thus be enabled to counteract any proposals of his Ministry which he regards as likely to give justifiable ground for complaint on this account. Without attempting to usurp the functions of the draftsman we suggest that the purpose we have in view would be adequately expressed in defining the special responsibility in some such terms as —

The expenditure in the Berars of a reasonable share of the revenues raised for the joint purposes of the Berars and the Central Provinces.

We think moreover that the Governor might appropriately be directed in his Instrument of Instructions to constitute some impartial body to advise him on the principles which should be followed in the distribution of revenues if he is not satisfied that past practice affords an adequate guide for his Ministers and himself for the discharge of the special responsibility imposed upon him in respect of them.

We also think that the special position of the Berars should be recognised by requiring the Governor through his Instrument of Instructions to interpret his special responsibility for the protection of the rights of any Indian State as involving inter alia an obligation upon him, in the administration of the Berars, to have due regard to the commercial and economic interests of the State of Hyderabad)

The same is agreed to.

Paragraph 79 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 79 is postponed.

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr. Butler. After paragraph , page 37, to insert the following new paragraph —

(" 79A We think it desirable to make some reference to the suggestion that among the special responsibilities of the Governor should be included the safeguarding of the financial stability and credit of the Province following the analogy of the special responsibility of this kind, which, as we shall explain later, we recommend should be imposed on the Governor-General in relation to the Federation ¹ A similar proposal was examined and rejected by the Statutory Commission ² on the ground that a power of intervention over so wide a field would hinder the growth of responsibility. We agree with this view. The other special responsibilities which we recommend will give the Governor adequate powers in relation to supply and taxation to ensure that their due discharge is not impeded by lack of financial resources, we refer specially to one aspect of this matter below.³ But the addition of a special financial responsibility would increase enormously the range of his special powers. There is no real parallel with the situation at the Centre where there is paramount necessity to avoid action which might prejudice the credit of India as a whole in the money markets of the world, and where so considerable a proportion of the revenues are needed for the expenditure of the reserved departments ⁴ The Statutory Commission point out that the Central Government, through their powers of control over Provincial Borrowing, should be able to exercise a salutary influence over Provinces. We also attach importance to this method of checking improvidence on the part of a Province, and, as we explain below,⁵ we approve, subject to one modification, the proposals in the White Paper for the regulation of Provincial Borrowing")

A special responsibility for safeguarding financial stability of Province not recommended.

The same is agreed to

Paragraphs 80 to 82 are again read and postponed.

Paragraph 83 is again read.

The amendment, by leave of the Committee is withdrawn.

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 39 line 9 to leave out from (appointment.) in line 9 to the end of the paragraph and to insert (We can see no advantage, and many disadvantages, in the second and third of these suggestions, and the fourth is open to the grave objection that it would infringe the Governor's prerogative. The only plan, therefore which, in our opinion merits consideration is the first. We have, however come to the conclusion that such advantages as might be anticipated from a provision in the Constitution Act enabling the Governor to appoint to his Ministry one or more persons who are not members of the Legislature would weigh little in the balance against the dislike and suspicion with which such a provision would undoubtedly be viewed almost universally in India—a dislike and suspicion so strong " that we think it unlikely that any Governor would in fact, find it possible to exercise such a power We recommend, therefore that the proposal in " the White Paper to which we have alluded should remain unchanged ")

Paragraph 85 is again read and postponed

Paragraphs 85 to 88 are again read

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock, the Lord Middleton, Sir Joseph Nall, and the Marquess of Salisbury Pages 40 to 42, to leave out paragraphs 85 to 88, and to insert the following new paragraph —

("85 In accordance with the recommendations of the Statutory Commission we agree to the proposed transfer to responsible Ministers of subjects of great importance, including among others Land Revenue Administration, Finance, Irrigation, and Forests The immense responsibilities involved in the efficient administration of these great departments cannot be denied They are all of vital importance to the interests of the people at large, but the question of law and order stands out by itself and we approach it with a profound sense of its vital importance in the solution of the Indian Constitutional problem. In the first place let us say that though no doubt the careful consideration of this subject during recent years, and the discussions upon it ought to have great weight with our judgment, yet the opinions upon it originally expressed by the various local Governments and by the Provincial Committees elected by the several legislatures to co-operate with the Statutory Commission are in our judgment of special value, because they reflect independent opinions held while the slate was clean and before any pronouncement on this subject or any plans for the reformed Constitution had been made by the Statutory Commission itself or by the Governor General or Provincial Governors or by the Secretary of State. The Commission have summarised these opinions as well as those of the local Governments and have set out the case for and against the transfer of Law and Order with scrupulous fairness in paragraphs 57 to 65 of their second volume. Though as is well known the Commission, not without some hesitation, reported in favour of the transfer to the new Provincial Ministers, they made certain observations commenting on these local expert opinions to which we would all attention. In paragraph 58 they write

In the same way there are British politicians sincerely desirous of helping India along the road indicated by the declaration of August 20th 1917 and by the preamble of the Government of India Act, who may find great difficulty whether from want of appreciation of Indian conditions or an innate conviction of the curative effects of self government, in realising why it is that many experienced and disinterested administrators who are familiar with the actual situation, as well as important bodies of non official opinion, hesitate to give their support at the present time to the proposal. It would be a great injustice to these men to dismiss their view as mere bureaucratic prejudice

we are bound to point out that it (hesitation to approve transfer) is a view by no means confined to the majority of British officers who are Inspectors General of Police in the various Provinces or to others whether British or Indian in important official positions but it has been expressly or impliedly supported by large bodies of non-official Indian opinion.

Moreover it is surely relevant to the issue with which we are now dealing that the recommendations of the Commission had to be made without any cognisance of the grave problem of terrorist conspiracies in Bengal of many most serious communal riots (including the shambles of Cawnpore in 1931), of the narrow escape of the European and Anglo-Indian residents in Sholapur in May 1930 of the dangerous Redshirt movement in the Frontier Province entailing serious military operations of the rebellion in Burma and of the attempts made to infect workers and peasants with communist doctrines. But this Committee and Parliament cannot regard all these sinister occurrences and movements as incidents to be ignored, nor would it have been possible for the Commission itself to have ignored them had they happened before their Report was presented to Parliament. In our view these later events afford ample reasons for reconsidering the proposal to transfer to the charge of inexperienced Ministers and Legislatures of unknown composition this vitally important department of Law and Justice

"There is a further point to which we must refer before setting out our conclusions. Defence is a Reserved Subject under the White Paper and that term comprehends not merely defence against foreign aggression or tribal incursions, but the maintenance throughout the land of internal security. It is, therefore, essential that in the disturbed times of communal riots and rebellions such as that which occurred in Burma, there must be the closest co-operation between the military and the police. Without such co-operation the troops are at a great disadvantage. They know nothing of the topography of the place in which they are called upon to assist the civil power or of the character of the mobs which they are called upon to overawe. The police have to be their eyes and ears upon all such occasions and it is all-important that the police and the troops should not in these emergencies be under divided control. But it is impossible to estimate how far this co-operation could be obtained if and when the police have come to recognise that their attitude and the support they will receive depend upon Ministers who have had no experience in difficult circumstances, and who, even if they are scrupulously fair, may be subject to popular accusations of partiality or corruption. The Statutory Commission have expressed admiration for the impartial conduct of the police, Hindus and Mohammedans alike, in the case of communal disturbances, and they have rightly attributed this faithful fulfilment of duty to the confidence of the police in their officers, of whom the majority are British. This confidence is born of the belief that the control of the police being reserved, their officers will not only support them but will themselves be supported by the Government. The change over of the control of the police to Ministers, though it may not shake the confidence of the rank and file in their British officers, may well shake the belief in the fulness of the support that the Government will give to the officers themselves, and if that belief is shaken, the disintegration of the loyalty of the police is sure, sooner or later, to follow.

"We believe that these considerations are of general application to the greater part of British India, but we gladly recognise that they will only be felt acutely in particular Provinces, being a relatively small minority of the whole, and we are aware that not only the Statutory Commission itself but many other authorities of great weight have expressed the opinion that full Provincial responsibility cannot be achieved without the transfer. On the whole, therefore, we are prepared to recommend a considerable step in that direction. But this must in our judgment be protected by certain safeguards which the Commission itself suggested and with such adjustments of precaution as have been rendered necessary by the emergency of subversive and terrorist movements since their Report was written.

"The recommendations of the Commission pre-supposed that the rest of their proposed Constitution would be accepted, that is to say that there would be a Government at the Centre not responsible to the legislature, and that there might be official Ministers in the Provinces supplementary to the responsible Governments. We admit that if it were agreed to lay aside the proposals for a Central responsible Government the risks of the transfer of Law and Order even where the Terrorist conspiracy is acute would be greatly diminished. In the same way we believe that the appointment of Councillors as part of the Provincial Governments would give greater security. It has been urged in evidence before us that in two or three Provinces Indians have already been in charge of the Home Department and have administered it with efficiency, but the point does not lie in any difference between an Indian and a European in this capacity. The position of an Executive Councillor on the reserved side of Government vis-a-vis the legislature is totally different from the position of a Minister under the White Paper scheme. In the first place he acts not as an individual but in the name of the Governor in Council. The decisions he makes are issued on that authority. In the second place he has been appointed by the Crown and unless he himself chooses to resign he is secure of his position for many years without any fear of his critics in the legislature, and without being at the mercy of a violent Press agitation, or of intrigues to bring about his resignation. He is thus in a sheltered position. The mere fact that an Indian Executive Councillor has filled this post with satisfaction offers no proof that a Minister in that position would have been equally successful. We consider therefore that the appointment, where he is required, of a nominated Councillor who may take charge of Law and Order is of great importance. When we use the words where he is required we mean until the Governor is able to satisfy Parliament that these safeguards can be dispensed with.

We could of course limit our recommendation to the particular instances where terrorist agitation is already acute, but there are other subversive movements and dangerous possibilities, and such a limitation does not adequately cover the necessary conditions. We prefer therefore, to put it forward in general terms and to advise that the Governor shall himself administer the police through a Councillor nominated by him, but that wherever after a reasonable time he may consider that the interests of the public peace no longer require these precautions, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of State by Order in Council, approved by both Houses of Parliament, to transfer the department to a responsible Minister. Provided that, if at any time, the Governor shall find that by reason of the transfer the peace and tranquillity of the Province is jeopardised he may for such time as he may think it expedient resume such control in whole or in part.

There is a further reason why these provisions should have effect. The organisation at present in operation against terrorism includes a vital element in the form of an Intelligence Department, both Provincial and Central. The Special Branch, as it is called, operates as a source of information, working through confidential agents. It was proved before us that this system is only possible where the agents consider themselves absolutely secure from any revelation of their identities. It is, of course abundantly possible that an Indian Minister responsible to the Legislature may be as deserving of absolute confidence in this respect as any nominated Councillor but however that may be we are fully satisfied that rightly or wrongly none of these agents would believe it, and the evidence was overwhelming that the least suspicion that their information passed into such hands would permanently dry up the source from which it comes. We consider therefore, that the Special Branch should be maintained under the orders of the Governor General in his discretion, and that any corresponding organisation in the Provinces should be under its directions through the Governor in his discretion. We think it right to add that these difficulties which surround the Special Branch and their solution carry us back to the question of the police and supply us with an additional cogent reason for entrusting the Governor with the power which we have already indicated of keeping them under his own control through a nominated Councillor. It has been pointed out to us upon great authority that in fighting terrorism it may be necessary not only to make secure the machinery of the Special Intelligence Branch itself but also to provide that there shall be no obstacles to prevent the police from effectively co-operating with it.)

The Marquess of Zetland, the Earl of Derby, the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst, the Lord Hutchison of Montrose, Major Cadogan, and the Lord Eustace Percy to move Paragraph 91, page 43, lines 12 and 13, to leave out lines 12 and 13 inclusive

The Lord Hutchison of Montrose to move Paragraph 1, page 43, lines 28 and 29, to leave out from ("that") in line 28 to ("and") in line 29 and to insert ("the practice is that in a secret service case the "names of agents are not disclosed to Ministers")

All amendments are to the Draft Report (vide infra paras 1—42B, pp 170—191; and vide supra paras 13—453, pp 84-253) and NOT to the Report as published (Vol I, Part I)

A Key is attached (see pp 521—544), showing on which pages of the Proceedings amendments to each paragraph can be found

Sir John Wardlaw Milne to move. Paragraph 91, page 43 line 33 to leave out from (" order ") to the end of the line and to insert (" must " be understood as themselves adopting ")

The Earl of Lytton to move. Paragraph 91 page 43 lines 36 to 38 to leave out from the second (" agents ") in line 36 to the end of the sentence and to insert (" themselves would not feel secure that their identity might not be revealed ")

The Marquess of Zetland, the Earl of Derby, the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst, the Lord Hutchison of Montrose, Major Cadogan, and the Lord Eustace Percy to move. Paragraph 92 pages 43 and 44 to leave out paragraph 92 and to insert the following new paragraph —

(" 92 In the circumstances set out above we are convinced that it should be made plain that the control of the organisation which exists, or may hereafter exist for the purpose of combating the terrorist movement is in the hands of the Governor-General at the centre and of the Governors in the provinces. To secure the object which we have in view we recommend that the Central Intelligence Bureau be placed under the control of the Governor General, as part of the Political and Foreign Department, and that in any province in which a special branch of the Police force exists or may hereafter be brought into being, the Inspector General shall take his orders direct from the Governor as the agent of the Governor General in all matters affecting the work of the special branch in whatever branch of police administration such matters may arise. We realise that in such circumstances the Minister in charge of the portfolio of Law and Order might be unwilling to answer in the Legislature for action taken on the initiative of the Governor and in that event we recommend that it shall be open to the Governor to appoint some person selected at his discretion to act as his spokesman, in the Legislature)

The Earl of Lytton to move. Paragraph 92 pages 43 and 44 to leave out paragraph 92 and to insert the following new paragraph —

(" 92 The existence of terrorist crime is a special disease which calls for special treatment. It necessitates departures from the ordinary law and the enactment of special legislation such as the Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act. The Special Branch is an essential feature of the machinery for combating terrorist activities, and as such we consider that it requires special treatment. We therefore recommend that this small and exceptional service where it exists should be a reserved service responsible to the Governor alone. ")

Sir John Wardlaw Milne to move. Paragraph 93 page 43 line 45 after (" Province ") to insert (" (who should continue to have direct access to him) ")

Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell to move. Paragraph 92, page 44 lines 10 to 13 to leave out from (" enforced. ") in line 10 to (" We ") in line 13

The consideration of the said amendments is postponed.

After discussion the further consideration of paragraphs 90 to 93 is again postponed.

Paragraph 93 is again read.

It is moved by the Marquess of Zetland the Earl of Derby the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst the Lord Hutchison of Montrose Major Cadogan, and the Lord Eustace Percy Page 44 lines 40 to 42 to leave out from (" notice ") in line 40 to the end of the paragraph

The amendment, by leave of the Committee is withdrawn

Paragraph 93 is again read.

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 95 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 95 is postponed

Paragraph 96 is again read

It is moved by the Lord Hutchison of Montrose, the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst, and Major Cadogan Page 46, line 27, after ("the") to insert ("number,") , lines 34 to 48, to leave out from ("administration,") in line 34 to the end of the paragraph

The amendments by leave of the Committee are withdrawn

Paragraph 96 is again read

The further consideration of paragraph 96 is postponed

Paragraphs 97 and 98 are again read and postponed

Paragraph 99 is again read

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Page 48 lines 8 to 21 to leave out "from ("Act") in line 8 to the end of the paragraph and to insert ("We agree " that, in addition to the power of issuing emergency ordinances to which we " refer later, the Governor should have this reserve power of legislation " We agree also with the proposed change in nomenclature since we can see " no possible advantage in describing an Act as the Act of the Legislature " when the Legislature has declined to enact it But we go further We agree " with the members of the British Indian Delegation in thinking it undesirable " that the Governor should be required to submit a proposed Governor's Act " to the Legislature before enacting it We do not, indeed, share the fear, " which we understand the British Indian Delegates to entertain that the " Governor might use this procedure for the purpose of seeking support in the " Legislature against his Ministers Our objection rather is that the proposed " procedure will be a useless formality in the only circumstances in which a " Governor's Act could reasonably be contemplated If the obstacle to any " legislation which the Governor thinks necessary to the discharge of his " special responsibilities lies, not in the unwillingness of the Legislature to " pass it, but in the unwillingness of his Ministers to sponsor it, his remedy lies not in a Governor's Act but in a change of Ministry. If on the other hand, the obstacle lies in the unwillingness of the Legislature there can clearly be no point in submitting the proposed legislation to it, and to do so might merely exacerbate political feeling. Since however there may be intermediate cases where an opportunity may usefully be given to the Legislature for revising a hasty or unconsidered decision previously made or threatened we think that the Governor should have the power (which we presume he would in many cases possess) to notify the Legislature by Message of his intention, at the expiration of say one month to enact a Governor's Act, the terms of which would be set out in the Message. It would then be open to the Legislature if it thought fit, to present an address to the Governor at any time before the expiration of the month, praying him only to enact the proposed Act with certain amendments which he could then consider upon their merits or it might even think fit to revise its former decision and to forestall the Governor by itself enacting legislation in the sense desired by him.)

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 99 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 99 is postponed

Paragraph 100 is again read

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Page 48 to leave out paragraph 100.

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 101 is again read

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Page 49 to leave out from the beginning of the paragraph to (we) in line 36

The same is agreed to

It is moved by Major Cadogan Page 49 lines 36 to 40 to leave out from (alone) in line 36 to the end of the paragraph

The amendment by leave of the Committee is withdrawn.

It is moved by Mr Attlee Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones and the Lord Snell Page 49 lines 39 and 40 to leave out from (We) in line 39 to the end of the paragraph and to insert (consider that all Governor's Acts should be laid before Parliament and that the Governor before legislating should have the concurrence of the Governor-General)

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 101 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 101 is postponed

Paragraph 102 is again read.

It is moved by the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst. Page 50 line 3 to leave out (if it should be thought) and to insert (we agree)

The same is agreed to

It is moved by the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst Lines 4 and 5 to leave out from (obtained,) in line 4 to the end of the paragraph

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 102 is again read as amended

Paragraph 103 again read and postponed

Paragraph 104 is again read

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Page 50 line 44 ^{to} after (resolution) to insert (in which case it will cease to operate forthwith)

The same is agreed to.

It is moved by the Lord Haldinge of Penshurst Page 51, line 5, after ("responsibility") to insert ("but with the concurrence of the Governor-General")

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 104 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 104 is postponed

Paragraph 105 is again read

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow on behalf of Sir Austen Chamberlain Page 51, line 12, to leave out from ("Act,") to ("all") and to insert ("to assume to himself by Proclamation"), line 21, to leave out ("obsolete") and to insert ("unnecessary"), and line 35, to leave out ("to") and to insert ("of")

The same are agreed to

Paragraph 105 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 105 is postponed

Paragraph 106 is again read and postponed

Paragraphs 107 to 115 are again read

The following amendments are laid before the Committee —

Sir Austen Chamberlain to move Paragraph 107, page 52, line 8, to leave out ("sense") and to insert ("measure")

Sir Austen Chamberlain to move Paragraph 108, page 52, line 31, to leave out ("sense") and to insert ("form")

Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell to move Paragraph 109, pages 52 and 53, to leave out paragraph 109

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne to move Paragraph 109, page 52, line 33, to page 53, line 2, to leave out from ("lines,") in line 33, page 52, to ("that") in line 2, page 53, and to insert ("nothing in the proposed directions of instructions should operate to prevent the growth of parties and the formation of homogeneous Ministries and we think")

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne to move Paragraph 109, page 53, line 6, to leave out ("many years to come") and to insert ("a time")

Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell to move Paragraph 111, page 53, lines 37 and 38, to leave out from ("Ministry,") in line 37 to ("seems") in line 38

Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell to move Paragraph 112, page 54, line 18, to leave out ("such as we have described,")

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne to move Paragraph 112, page 54, line 20, to leave out ("assert its authority") and to insert ("maintain its influence")

Sir Austen Chamberlain to move Paragraph 112, page 54, line 20, to leave out ("assert its authority") and to insert ("acquire sufficient authority"), and line 26, to leave out ("Constitution") and to insert ("Constitutions")

The consideration of the said amendments is postponed.

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy, pages 52 to 57, to leave out paragraphs 107 to 115 inclusive and to insert the following new paragraphs — consideration is the one which we have already emphasised the vital importance in India of a strong Executive. It has seemed to us in the course of our discussions with the British Indian delegates that in their anxiety to increase the prerogatives of the Legislature they have been apt to overlook the functions of the Executive an attitude not perhaps surprising in those to whom at the present time the Legislature offers the main field of political activity. But if the responsibility for government is henceforward to be borne by Indians themselves they will do well to remember that to magnify the Legislature at the expense of the Executive is to diminish the authority of the latter and to weaken the sense of responsibility of both. The function of the Executive is to govern and to administer; that of the Legislature to vote supply to criticise to educate public opinion, and to legislate and great mischief may result from attempts by the latter to invade the executive sphere. The belief that parliamentary government is incompatible with a strong Executive is no doubt responsible for the distrust with which parliamentary institutions have come to be regarded in many parts of the world. The United Kingdom affords a sufficient proof that a strong Executive may co-exist even with an omnipotent Parliament if the necessary conditions are present and the strength of the Executive in this country may we think, be attributed with not more justice to the support of a disciplined party than to the inveterate and cherished tradition of Parliament that the prerogatives of the Legislature are not to be jealously or factiously asserted in such a way as to prevent the King's Government from being carried on. His Majesty's Opposition is not an idle phrase, but embodies a constitutional doctrine of great significance.

("107 In the preceding paragraphs we have approved the proposal of the White Paper to entrust certain wide discretionary powers to the Governor, and we have recommended that, in certain respects, those powers should be strengthened and extended. We should not wish to pass from this subject without some general review of the broad considerations which have led us to these conclusions. The dominant ^{vital importance of Executive in India}

communal representation
in Ministries.

108. It is a commonplace that this tradition is as yet unknown in India and that Indian Ministries have not hitherto been able to rely on the support of a disciplined party. The Statutory Commission, in surveying the work of the existing Provincial Constitution, observed that Governors, in choosing their Ministers have had an exceptionally difficult task. It could seldom be predicted what following a Minister would have in the Legislature, quite apart from the fact that his acceptance of office was often followed, owing to personal rivalries, by the detachment of some of his previous adherents. It has been urged upon us by the members of the British Indian Delegation that those difficulties will tend to disappear under responsible government. We hope that it will be so and neither we nor the Statutory Commission would have recommended that the experiment should be made if we were not satisfied that under no other system can Indians come to appreciate the value of the tradition of which we have spoken. But it must be remembered that in two respects the difficulties of Provincial Ministries in the future may be greater than in the past. In the first place, they will not in future be able to rely upon the official bloc which, in the words of the Statutory Commission 'has helped to decrease the instability of the balance of existing groups in the Legislature and has made the tenure of office of Ministers far less precarious.' In the second place each Ministry will, as we have already pointed out, be a composite one. The Legislatures will be based on a system of communal representation and the Governor will be directed by his Instrument of Instructions to include in his Ministry so far as possible, members of important minority communities. A Ministry thus formed must tend to be the representative not, as in the United Kingdom of a single majority Party or even of a coalition of Parties, but of minorities as such. Moreover the system of communal representation may also tend to render less effective the weapon to which under most parliamentary constitutions, the executive resorts when confronted by an obstructive legislature, the weapon of dissolution for under such a system even a general election may well produce a legislature with the same complexion as its predecessor.

" 109, It is unfortunately impossible to provide against these dangers by any paper enactment regulating the relations between the Ministry and the Legislature. The British Indian delegates laid great stress upon the collective responsibility of the Provincial Ministries, and in their Joint Memorandum they urged that the Instrument of Instructions should contain a definite direction to the Governor that the collective responsibility of Ministers is to be introduced forthwith. This seems to us to confuse cause and effect. The collective responsibility of Ministers to the Legislature is not a rule of law to be put into operation at discretion, but a constitutional convention which only usage and practice can define or enforce, and, since that convention is the outcome and not the cause of Ministerial solidarity, it is as likely to be hindered as helped by artificial devices which take no account of the realities of the situation. It is noticeable, for example, that, in constitutions like that of France where the principle of collective responsibility is laid down in the constitution, the effect seems to have been merely to introduce the formality of a joint resignation as a preliminary to every reconstruction of a Ministry. Our attention has also been drawn to the possibility of providing that a Ministry, after receiving a vote of confidence from the Legislature on its appointment by the Governor, should remain in office for a fixed period unless previously dismissed by him. The objection to this proposal, of which there are obvious possible variants, is that the existence of a Ministry which had not, in fact, the confidence of the Legislature could, in practice, be made impossible. There is every reason why Ministries in India should refuse to treat a hostile vote, even on a demand for supply, as necessarily entailing resignation, it may even be desirable that a Ministry should only resign on a direct vote of no confidence, but under a system of parliamentary government there is no effective method of securing statutory permanence of tenure to a Ministry faced by a consistently hostile Legislature. All that the framers of a constitution can do in this matter is to refrain from any paper provisions which might tend indirectly to prejudice the development of a sound relationship between Ministry and Legislature. We think that the wording of the Governor's Instrument of Instructions proposed in the White Paper in regard to the selection of his Ministers should be re-examined with a view to giving greater latitude to the Governor. It is our earnest hope that, in the future, parties may develop in the Provincial Legislatures which will cut across communal lines, and the proposed wording of the Instrument of Instructions as it now stands might, if literally obeyed, operate to prevent both the growth of such parties and the formation of homogeneous Ministries. We recognise that nothing ought to be done at the present time which would excite suspicion or distrust in the mind of the minorities, but in this, as in other matters, we think that the course of wisdom is to give the Governor the widest possible latitude."

A statutory permanence of tenure for Ministry inconsistent with Parliamentary
government

" 110 It follows from these considerations that the only way of strengthening the Provincial Executives in India is to confer adequate discretionary powers on the Governor. These powers are defined in the White Paper, we think rightly, as being the Governor's responsibilities, because it is on him that the corresponding special powers must, in the nature of things, be conferred, but the responsibilities are defined and the powers conferred, not for the purpose of superseding Ministers or enabling them to escape responsibilities which properly belong to them, but primarily in order that the executive as a whole may possess the authority which experience shows to be essential to the success of parliamentary government. To none of the Governor's special responsibilities do these considerations apply with more force than to that relating to the Public Services, for the existence of an efficient and contented civil service, immune from political interference and free

Governor's reserve powers a guarantee for development of
government

from political partialities, is the indispensable condition, not only for the effective exercise of the Governor's special powers, but also for the strength of the executive as a whole. On this subject we shall have certain further proposals to make in a later part of our Report. Nor is the case different with the Governor's extraordinary power, if the constitutional machinery should break down, to assume to himself (subject to the overriding authority of Parliament) any function of government that may appear to him necessary even to the extent of suspending the Legislature and administering the Province without it. Like the power of dissolution, which it supplements, this power is designed to strengthen the executive as a whole. We hope, and are willing to believe, that it will never become necessary to put this power into operation but its existence in the background, together with the whole body of the Governor's reserve powers, may well prove the most effective guarantee for the development of a genuine system of responsible government.')

The said amendment is agreed to

New paragraphs 107 to 110 are again read.

The further consideration of paragraphs 107 to 110 is postponed.

Paragraph 118 is again read

It is moved by Mr Attlee and Mr Cocks Pages 57 and 58, to leave out paragraph 118 and to insert the following new paragraph —

(" 118 In our view, Second Chambers as proposed in the White Paper and composed largely of landowners and reactionary elements opposed in general to the wishes of the mass of the people, are undemocratic We are in favour of one Chamber only We should like, on this subject, to quote with approval the opinion of some Members of the Indian Statutory Commission

All amendments are to the Draft Report (vide infra, paras 1—42B, pp 470—491, and vide supra paras 43—453, pp 64—253) and NOT to the Report as published (Vol I, Part I)

A Key is attached (see pp 521—544), showing on which pages of the Proceedings amendments to each paragraph can be found

It has generally been proposed in evidence before the Joint Conference to constitute Second Chambers disproportionately representative of vested interests. They fear that such Chambers would be regarded as an undemocratic instrument of Government and that ceaseless conflict between the two Houses would result. They think that this danger will be a real one, however the Second Chambers may be formed. Whilst a Second Chamber will not be a substitute for the Governor's powers, its existence may be used as an argument for modifying the Governor's powers before this is desirable and it may support the Lower House against the Governor and so increase rather than prevent friction between him and the Legislature. So long as Ministers are secured in the support of the Lower House, and so obtain the funds which they require, the Second Chamber can exercise little control on the administrative side, and it is here that the influence of a Legislature is most required.

In the Joint Memorandum submitted to us by the British Indian Delegation they pointed out that only one of their number was in favour of Second Chambers in the three Provinces of Bengal, Bihar and the United Provinces while another Member of the Delegation considered that only in the case of the United Provinces was a Second Chamber necessary. All the others were totally opposed to the creation of Second Chambers in Bengal, Bihar and the United Provinces. There are two other arguments against Second Chambers which must be given due weight. The first is the additional cost on Indian revenues, which would be considerable and out of all proportion to the benefit, if any to be gained and the second is the drain on the personnel of the Province which would be made by creating so large a number of seats which must be filled.)

Paragraph 120 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 120 is postponed

Paragraph 121 is read

It is moved by the Marquess of Zetland. Page 59 to leave out paragraph 121 and to insert the following new paragraph --

(121 We have found ourselves in some difficulty in dealing with this aspect of the problem owing to the declaration of the Government referred to in paragraph 119 that they would entertain no suggestions for the alteration of their Award which had not the support of all the parties affected and we might well have felt justified in the circumstances in holding that the matter was one which had been placed beyond our purview. This course was rendered difficult however by the representations of those who desired to give evidence before us, as to its effect upon the development of responsible self government particularly in the Presidency of Bengal and by deciding as we did that such evidence was admissible we automatically brought the matter within the scope of our enquiry. The original Award was strongly criticised by more than one witness who appeared before us on the ground that it must operate inequitably in the case of Bengal and it was urged that the disadvantage at which the caste Hindus would be placed under it would be greatly intensified as a result of the adoption of the Poona Pact. Particular objection was taken to the reservation of seats and the employment of separate communal electorates in a province in which the community in whose interest the reservation would form a majority of the population. We cannot but be impressed by the force of this contention and we think it desirable that we should set forth our views as to the purpose for which the reservation of seats and the device of separate electorates should be employed

The system was introduced at the time of the Minto-Morley Reforms of 1909 with a view to safeguarding the interests of minorities and in particular the Moslem Minority and while on general grounds we may deplore the necessity for such a device we have reluctantly come to the conclusion that in existing circumstances in India the necessity persists. We do not therefore propose to elaborate the objections which may be urged against the system as a whole. But it is one thing to concede separate communal electorates for the purpose of giving Minorities reasonable representation in the various legislatures it is an entirely different thing to employ the system for the purpose of conferring upon a majority community in any particular province a permanent majority in the legislature unalterable by any appeal to the electorate. Such a course has never hitherto been adopted. It was considered and rejected by the Statutory Commission, who declared that a claim submitted to them which in Bengal and the Punjab would give to the Moslem community a fixed and unalterable majority in the general constituency seats was one which they could not entertain. It would be unfair, they wrote that Muhammadans should retain the very considerable weightage they now enjoy in the six provinces and that there should at the same time be imposed in face of Hindu and Sikh Opposition a definite Moslem majority in the Punjab and in Bengal unalterable by any appeal to the electorate. This is the position which will arise if the distribution of seats proposed in the White Paper for the Legislative Assembly of Bengal is given effect to. The Legislative Assembly is to consist of 250 seats. Of these 51 are allotted to Special interests, leaving 199 general seats. Of these general seats 110 are to be reserved for Moslems leaving 89 for the Hindus. But under the terms of the Poona Pact 30 of these 89 seats are to be reserved for the so-called depressed classes, hereafter to be known as the Scheduled Castes, and the number of general seats open to the Caste Hindus is thus reduced to 50. It is probable that in the case of the 20 special interest seats which are open to Moslems and Hindus, the great majority will fall to the Hindus, but even if the Caste Hindus were to secure the whole 20 seats they would still be arbitrarily limited by Statute to 70 seats in a Legislative Assembly of 250. To restrict in this way the possible share in the government of the province, of the community which plays a predominant part in its intellectual and political life, seems to us to be both unwise and unfair. Before making our recommendations we have one further comment to make on the effect in Bengal of the Poona Pact. The object of reserving seats for the depressed classes should be in our view, to secure to the real depressed classes—that is to say the Sudras, or outcastes—a voice in the legislature. We believe that in Bengal the number of such people is small, and we fear that the result of extending the list of scheduled castes as proposed in the White Paper, will be to defeat the object in view, for it will not then be members of the real depressed classes who will be returned for the Scheduled Caste Seats, but members of the powerful Namasudra and Rajbansi Castes who experience no difficulty in getting returned to the legislature even now without any reservation of seats at all, and whose interests are as much opposed to those of the untouchables as are the interests of the highest castes themselves.

“ We have now to submit our recommendations. With the Moslems in a majority in any particular province, we think that no reservation of seats for them ought to be necessary, and the logical solution of the problem would be to make no provision for a separate Moslem electorate but to throw the whole of the general seats open to Moslems and Hindus, so that candidates whether Moslems or Hindus would have to stand on their merits and make their appeal to the electors at large. We realise, however, that in this case that which is desirable is not necessarily expedient and we feel constrained to suggest a less radical alteration. We therefore, recommend as a general principle that in any province in which seats are reserved for a community which constitutes a majority of the population, a decision whether election in the case of the general seats, including those reserved for the majority community, should be by separate or by joint electorate, should rest with the minority.

“ There remains the question of the Poona Pact. We need not recall the circumstances in which the so-called pact was concluded. We do not think that those who were parties to it can be said to have been accredited representatives of the caste Hindus or to have possessed any mandate to effect a settlement. We think that the arrangements for the representation of the depressed classes contained in the original award of His Majesty's Government were preferable and we recommend their adoption. In the appropriate place we give tables setting forth the distribution of seats in the legislatures in accordance with our proposals.

“ Apart from the general alteration in the distribution of seats due to a return to the original Communal Award in the case of the Depressed Classes, our proposals involve some further redistribution of the seats in the case of the Legislative Assembly of Bengal and we think it desirable to explain here the reasons for the alterations which we propose. Under the proposals contained in the White Paper the Assembly in Bengal will consist of 250 members. Of these 250 seats 51 will be reserved for the representation of special interests, leaving 199 general territorial constituencies. Of these general seats 119 are to be reserved for Moslems leaving 80 only for the Hindu community including the Depressed Classes. Since the population ratio is approximately 55 per cent Moslem and 45 per cent Hindu it follows that so far as the general territorial constituencies are concerned the Moslems are being given ten seats more and the Hindus ten seats less than they would be entitled to on a population basis. It is true that this disparity will almost certainly be lessened as a result of the elections to the special interest seats which will be open to Moslems and Hindus. Those number 20 and various estimates of the proportions of them which will be won by Moslems and Hindus respectively were submitted to us in the course of the evidence which was laid before us. We think that the Moslems may be expected to secure six of the 20 seats, which would bring their total representation up to 125 seats as compared with 94 seats in the case of the Caste Hindus and the Depressed Classes taken together. But even supposing that the Moslems were to secure none of the 20 seats they would still fill 119 seats as compared with 110 which is the maximum number of seats open to the Caste Hindus and the Depressed Classes combined under the proposals of the White Paper.

We have already stated our objections to conferring upon a community by statute a definite majority unalterable by any appeal to the electorate. When the relative position of the two communities in Bengal in everything except actual numbers is taken into account, it will be seen that the reasons against placing the Hindu community in a position of permanent statutory inferiority in the legislature are particularly strong. Under British rule the Hindus have played an enormously predominant part in the intellectual, the cultural, the political, the professional and the commercial life of the province. More than 84 per cent. of those who are literate in Bengal are Hindus; nearly 80 per cent. of the students attending High Schools, nearly 83 per cent. of those in Degree classes, and nearly 86 per cent. of the post graduate and research students are Hindus. A similar preponderance is found in the case of the professions, and in the case of Banking, Insurance and Exchange. In all previous Constitutions the significance of these facts has been admitted. Under the Lucknow Pact (an agreement between Moslems and Hindus arrived at in 1916) the Moslems in Bengal were allotted no more than 40 per cent. of the seats proposed to be filled by Indians by election; and under the Constitution now in force there are reserved for them only 40 per cent. of the general territorial constituencies.

In the circumstances set forth above we should have felt justified, had the slate upon which we have to write been a clean one, in recommending that in Bengal all general territorial constituencies should be open to candidates of both communities without reservation of seats or separate electorates (except in the case of the 10 seats reserved for the Depressed Classes). But as we have already pointed out, the slate upon which we have to write is very far from being a clean one, and we have felt obliged to steer a middle course between the claims of the Hindus and the expectations which have been aroused in the minds of the Moslems. Broadly speaking, as will be seen from an examination of the Appendix, the effect of the changes which we propose in the scheme of the White Paper will be as follows:—

(1) To give to Moslems or to Hindus, whichever is the minority community in any particular province the right to decide whether election in the case of the general territorial constituencies shall be by separate or by joint electorates;

(2) In the case of Bengal to allot the general territorial seats between Moslems and Hindus on a population basis; and

3 To give to the Depressed Classes in all provinces the representation given to them by the Government under their original Award before it was modified by the Poona Pact.

There is one other point to which we wish to refer. Under the provisions of the White Paper* no change in the distribution of seats under the Communal Award is to be made during the first ten years during which the Constitution is in operation, and thereafter no proposals for modification will be taken into consideration which do not carry with them the assent of the communities affected. We think that it is unlikely that such assent will be given by a community entrenched in a position of statutory superiority in the legislature, and we recommend, therefore, that it should be open to either community at the expiration of ten years to petition Parliament to modify the Award ")

1 Seats in the Legislative Assemblies in the Governors' provinces will be allocated as shown in the above table

2 Election to the seats allotted to Moslems, Europeans and Sikhs will ordinarily be by voters voting in separate communal electorates covering between them the whole area of the province, apart from any portions which may in special cases be excluded from the electoral area as backward. In any province, however, in which a Moslem or Hindu minority so desires, election in the case of the general territorial constituencies including those allotted to Moslems, shall be by joint electorates. For the purpose of the foregoing paragraph, the wishes of the minority shall be ascertained by means of a resolution moved in the legislative council prior to the coming into operation of the Constitution Act, upon which the members of the minority community will alone be permitted to vote

3 All qualified electors who are not voters either in a Moslem, Sikh, Indian Christian, Anglo-Indian or European Constituency, will be entitled to vote in a general constituency

4 Members of the Depressed Classes qualified to vote will vote in a general constituency. In view of the fact that for a considerable period these classes would be unlikely, by this means alone, to secure adequate representation in the Legislature, a number of special seats will be assigned to them as shown in the table. These seats will be filled by election from special constituencies in which only members of the depressed classes electorally qualified will be entitled to vote. Any person voting in such a special constituency will, as stated above, be also entitled to vote in a general constituency. It is intended that these constituencies should be formed in selected areas where the depressed classes are most numerous, and that, except in Madras, they should not cover the whole area of the province

5 Election to seats allotted to Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians, Labour, Landholders and all other special interests shall be as proposed in the White Paper.

Paragraph 121 is again considered

It is moved by the Marquess of Reading, the Lord K. (M. Forster), and Mr. Lord Pears, 59 and 60, to leave out from ("Assembly") in line 13, page 59, to the end of the paragraph in page 60 and to insert ("We feel somewhat differently, however, about the Poona Pact. We consider that the original proposals of His Majesty's Government constitute a more equitable settlement of the general communal question and one which is more advantageous to the Depressed Classes themselves in their present stage of development. They united the two sections of the Hindu Community by making them vote together in the general constituencies, thereby compelling candidates to consider the well-being of both sections of his constituents when appealing for their support, while they secure to the Depressed Classes themselves sufficient spokesman in the legislature, elected wholly by depressed class voters, to ensure their case being heard and to influence voting, but not so numerous that the Depressed Classes will probably be unable to find representatives of adequate calibre with results unfortunate both to themselves and the legislatures. That solution was altered, in a great hurry, under pressure of Mr. Gandhi's 'fast unto death'. In view of the fact that His Majesty's Government felt satisfied that the agreement come to at Poona fell within the terms of their original announcement and accepted it as a valid modification of the communal award, we do not feel able to recommend them now to reject it")

17

It is moved by the Lord Rankellour. As an amendment to the above amendment to leave out from ("death") in line 17 of the amendment to the end of the paragraph and to insert ("In view of these considerations we feel obliged to recommend the Government to reconsider the matter especially as regards Bengal")

The said amendment to the amendment is disagreed to

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler As an amendment to the original amendment at the end to insert (But subsequently to the arrangement of the Pact objections to it in relation to Bengal have been strongly urged by caste Hindus from that Province We should welcome “ an agreement between the caste Hindus and Depressed Classes to reduce the number of seats reserved to the latter in Bengal, possibly with some “ compensatory increase in such seats in some other Provinces where a small addition in favour of the Depressed Classes would not be likely materially to affect the balance of communities in the Legislature)

The same is agreed to

The original amendment as amended is agreed to

Paragraph 121 is again read.

The further consideration of paragraph 121 is postponed.

It is moved by Mr Butler and Sir Samuel Hoare After paragraph 121 to insert the following new paragraph — (121A We have given careful consideration in this connexion to the number of seats to be allotted to special interests and in particular to representations submitted to us in favour of a substantial increase in the number of seats to be allotted to Labour in the new Provincial Legislatures. Any material alteration in the number of seats allotted to special interests would inevitably involve a reopening of the Communal Award, and we have indicated above the objections to be seen to this. But we are in any case of opinion that the representation proposed in the White Paper for landlords, commerce and industry universities and labour the object of which is essentially to make expert knowledge available in the legislatures and not to give any particular voting strength to individual interests may be regarded as striking a just balance between the claims of the various interests, and as affording an adequate representation for them. We observe in particular that the representation of labour has been increased from 9 seats in the present Provincial Legislative Councils to a total of 29 the present marked difference between the representation of labour and of commerce and industry being thus very substantially reduced. Having regard to this, to the large number of seats set aside for the Depressed Classes (whose representatives will to some extent at any rate represent labour interests), and to the extension of the franchise, which will bring on the electoral roll large numbers of the poorer and of the labouring classes, we are of opinion that the position of labour, the importance of which we fully recognise, is adequately safeguarded under the proposals embodied in the White Paper ")

The Amendment, by leave of the Committee, is withdrawn

Paragraph 122 is again read.

It is moved by Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell Page 60, to leave out paragraph 122 and to insert the following new paragraph —

(" 122 We accept the numbers suggested in the White Paper for Special the Provincial Legislatures, subject to the following alterations We ^{interests seats} can see no reason for the provision for special seats for landlords In the Report of the Indian Statutory Commission, Volume II, Part II, Chapter 2, Section 90, the question of the special representation of landholders was exhaustively reviewed They came to the conclusion that the landholding interests have in fact at the present time been returned for four times as many seats as were specially reserved for them and considered that the special protection furnished to them at the present time could be safely withdrawn We are entirely in agreement with this view If special representation were needed it should be given not to those who by reason of their wealth and status in the community command influence and power, but to those who by reason of their poverty and low status are likely to find their claims overlooked We are also opposed to special representation of universities We know that the Indian Statutory Commission agreed that university seats should be preserved, but with considerable hesitation From our own experience we find that university seats do not provide a special class of representative differing in any essential from those who find their way into legislative assemblies through general constituencies, and we, therefore, propose that these special seats should be abolished With regard to the representation of Commerce and Industry and Planting Interests, here, again, we consider that the wealth and influence of these classes will always be sufficient to obtain for them adequate representation in the legislature In the case of Europeans, where admittedly there may be little likelihood of their being elected from general constituencies, we recognize that, in view of the long connection of the British people with India and the special interests of Europeans, that there should be special representation for them We believe, also, that the presence of Europeans in the Legislative Assemblies has been welcome to their Indian colleagues as bringing in an experience which has been found very valuable We think that the representation given to Europeans should be frankly given to them as such and they should not be returned as representatives of Industry and Commerce The abolition of these special seats will provide for an increase in the number to be allotted to the territorial constituencies and thus allow of some reduction in their area and population This should, of course, be done with due regard to preserving the communal proportions ")

The amendment, by leave of the Committee, is withdrawn.

Paragraph 122 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 122 is postponed

It is moved by Mr Cocks, Mr Attlee, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell page 60 after paragraph 122, to insert the following new paragraphs:—

Increased Labour
 Representation

(122A. We consider also that there should be an increase in the number of seats reserved for Labour. It might be contended that having rejected the claims of the landholding and capitalist classes to special representation, we are not equitable in retaining special seats for Labour. The answer is the same as that applicable to the case of the depressed classes. It is necessary to give special protection to those whose economic circumstances render them liable to exploitation.

The Indian Franchise Committee in its report stressed the importance of adequate representation of Labour in the Legislatures, pointing out that the force of Labour is in its numbers, and that until a further lowering of the franchise secures it more wholly adequate representation in the electoral roll special representation is necessary and it quotes with approval the views expressed by the Royal Commission on Indian Labour "if special electorates are to remain a feature of the Indian Constitution, there is hardly any class with so strong a claim to representation by this method as industrial labour and further if special constituencies are retained it should be recognised that Labour has not less claim to representation than employers." With these views we are in full accord.

" The Indian Franchise Committee recommended that 38 seats should be given to Labour in the Provincial Legislative Councils as against 46 seats allocated to Commerce and Industry. The White Paper has increased this disparity by adding yet another 10 to the latter. Vested interests are also reinforced in the White Paper proposals by the votes given to the landlords. The Indian Franchise Committee further pointed out that ' the administration of labour legislation must for the most part be in the hands of the provinces and we regard it as essential that the Provincial Legislatures should contain representatives of Labour who can watch over the provincial administration and can represent the legitimate desires and grievances of the industrial labouring class '

" We therefore consider the representation given in the White Paper as quite inadequate. We support the proposal of the Indian National Trade Union Conference that Labour should be given at least 10 per cent of the total number of seats

" 122B We should prefer that as far as possible Labour Representation should be obtained by establishing adult suffrage in the industrial and planting and the large cities. We consider that the more developed administration in those areas would be able to cope with increased electorate, while there is no reason why the franchise level should be the same in all constituencies. In our own country there was for many years a great diversity of franchise as between urban and rural areas. The method of securing Labour Representation.

" We especially desire this method because it is in our view far better that the needs of the wage earners should be brought home to the candidates of all classes who would be affected by the existence of a labour vote than that labour representatives should be returned by constituencies of electors segregated from the rest of the community

" We recognize, however, that this method is at present only of limited application, and that pending the introduction of adult suffrage generally it is necessary to provide for special constituencies

122C Accordingly we concur with the Indian Franchise Committee's proposals for Trade Union Constituencies as a temporary measure. Trade Union Constituencies.
The recommendation was to form these constituencies in the following manner. —

(a) To qualify as an electoral unit for the purpose of voting for a special Trade Union Constituency, a Union should have been registered for a minimum period of one year (in the case of the first election under the new constitution six months)

(b) Direct voting where the trade union is confined to one area

(c) Where the Trade Union covers two or more centres, election to the seat or seats allotted to the trade unions in the particular province through an electoral college composed of delegates in each union in the proportion of one for every group of one hundred voters

(d) In the varying circumstances of individual provinces seats might if conditions make it feasible and desirable, be allotted from among the trade union seats to be filled by representatives of trade unions of special importance or of specially large membership

" 122D The suggested qualifications of electors to trade union constituencies should be — Qualification of electors.

(a) Minimum age of 21 years

(b) Paid up membership for at least six months of a registered trade union, which has itself been in existence for twelve months (in the first election under the new constitution membership three months, registration of union six months)

They also suggest that a candidate for a trade union constituency should be either a member or an honorary member or an official as defined in the Trade Unions Act, of one of the trade unions concerned, his position in any of these capacities to be not less than one year's standing)

Voluntary act.

(150A. The rights, authority and jurisdiction which will thus be conferred by the Crown on the new Central Government will not extend to any Indian State. It follows that the accession of an Indian State to the Federation cannot take place otherwise than by the voluntary act of its Ruler. The Constitution Act cannot itself make any Indian State a member of the Federation: it will only prescribe a method whereby the State may accede and the legal consequences which will flow from the accession. There can be no question of compulsion so far as the States are concerned. Their Rulers can enter or stand aside from the Federation as they think fit. They have announced their willingness to consider federation with the Provinces of British India on certain terms: but whereas the powers of the new Central Government in relation to the Provinces will cover a wide field and will be identical in the case of each Province, the Princes have intimated that they are not prepared to agree to the exercise by a Federal Government for the purpose of the Federation of a similar range of powers in relation to themselves.)

The same is agreed to.

It is moved by Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell. Page 81 line 20 at the end to insert (Before doing this, however we think it is “ necessary to point out that responsibility may take many forms. We believe that any attempt to try to create responsibility at the Centre by an exact reproduction of the machinery which functions at Westminster would be doomed to failure. In the first place, the system of responsible government as we know it in this country depends on stable divisions on Party lines and generally speaking, functions satisfactorily where there are only two main Parties. These parties should not be the creation of groups formed by Members of the Legislature subsequent to their election, but should represent real divisions of opinion which extend back to the constituencies. In the Federal Legislature, apart from the communal cleavages which already make the working of the British system difficult in many Provinces, there is to be a sharp division of the Legislature into two categories of members, one of elected representatives from British India, the other of nominees of the Rulers of States. It seems difficult, therefore, to envisage the emergence of Parties on the lines familiar to us in this country. Two further obstacles present themselves. The first is that, owing to the nature of the Federation, the Members of the Legislature will not be equally concerned in its territory, and that the jurisdiction of the Federation will not extend as to all subjects equally over that territory, while the other is that the subject-matter of Central administration and legislation provides a rather slender basis for a full parliamentary system. We realise that 90 per cent of everything that concerns the ordinary citizen comes within the ambit of the Provincial administration. For these reasons we consider that responsibility at the Centre will be developed on lines very different from those obtaining at Westminster. We think that it is not always realised in India that the British Cabinet is in fact the master of the Legislature. This is a result of the Party system, for the Cabinet, though formally selected by the Crown, is really composed of the leading members of the Party in a majority. It maintains its power largely through the discipline of the Party machine backed by the power of dissolution. We think that this power of the Ministry to control the Legislature will not be reproduced at Delhi; indeed, we think that the Ministry will be far more the servant of the Legislature than its master. Under these circumstances, we think that the real responsibility will lie rather with the Members of the Legislature than with the Ministers, that is to say, that the Members of the Legislature will have to take full responsibility for their actions. We do not think that the practice, whereby a Ministry is dependent from day to day on a vote of the Legislature during a Session, is workable in India. We suggest proposals, which will give what is essential—greater stability to the administration ”)

(“ ³This term does not, of course, include relations with the Indian States in matters in which they have not agreed to federate, such matters will be dealt with personally by the Viceroy as representative of the Crown. It follows from this that any State matter which a Ruler has not accepted as federal in the case of his State will not be subject to discussion in the Federal, or a Provincial, Legislature, unless the Governor-General, or the Governor, considers that British Indian interests are affected ”)

(166 We do not wish to repeat here what we have already said with regard to special responsibilities. We consider that the White Paper proposals in regard to the Governor General are open to the same objection as those suggested in the case of the Provincial Governors and we make the same recommendations for modification. In addition we do not think it necessary that the Governor General should have a special responsibility for safeguarding the financial stability and credit of the Federation. It is in our view useless to give power and responsibility on the one hand and take it away with the other. If Indian representatives are not capable of conducting on sound lines the finances of the Federation they are not capable of self government.)

Paragraph 171 is again read.

It is moved by Mr Morgan Jones, Mr Cocks, and the Lord Snell. Page 86 line 33 to leave out from (" India) in line 33 to the end of the paragraph and to insert (We recognize the serious constitutional issue raised by the existence of the Indian Defence Problem and the way in which " it is met at the present time by the Army in India. So long as British troops are employed in India, whether for external defence or for internal " security it is, in our view impossible to bring them under the orders of a responsible Minister The Indian Statutory Commission examined the whole constitutional position created by the existence of the Indian Army at great length and they recognized that it was a formidable obstacle to the development of complete self government. We believe that Indian " public opinion is extremely sensitive on this point, but that the majority of the leading statesmen recognize the hard facts of the situation. At the same time, we believe that it is essential that the Constitution should contain provisions for the bringing to an end of an anomalous position. " We consider that there should be a definite programme of Indianization with a time-limit of thirty years. It may be urged that it is impossible to lay down an exact period within which an Indianized Army would be capable of the defence of India. There may be truth in this, but we consider that it is necessary if the work of Indianization is to be pushed forward with the greatest possible energy that there should be a clearly marked time by which the goal is to be attained. From a study of such reports " and documents as have been available to us, we believe that this could be successfully accomplished in a period of twenty five years. We suggest that that period should be aimed at but that a maximum of thirty years should " be fixed which must not be exceeded."

¹White Paper Proposal 12.

All amendments are to the Draft Report (vide supra paras. 1-4 B pp. 4 0-421; and vide supra paras. 43-453 pp. 64-253) and NOT to the Report as published (Vol. I Part I).

A Key is attached (see pp. 521-544) showing on which page of the Proceedings amendments to each paragraph can be found

“ At the same time, we are impressed with the very large proportion of ^{The Burden} her revenues which India spends on Defence We do not suggest that this ^{of Defence} is in excess of the amount needed to maintain sufficient forces for the requirements of India, and we are aware that a recent agreement on the subject of the capitation payments has resulted in an advantage of a million pounds a year in India's favour, but we consider that, as compared with other parts of the Empire outside the United Kingdom, India has for years borne, and is still bearing, an undue expense It may be urged that India's defence by sea is provided by Great Britain, but her danger from the sea is a potential rather than an actual menace India possesses in the North-West Frontier the one land frontier in the whole of the British Commonwealth which not only borders on areas which are frequently liable to be disturbed, but is exposed to the possibility of invasion by a hostile power While we recognise the vital necessity of the safe keeping of this frontier in the interest of India herself, we cannot but recognize that the menace to that barrier may well result, not from anything which India herself does, but from the mere fact of her being a Member of the British Commonwealth We therefore consider that the whole question of Imperial Defence and the responsibilities of the various Members of the British Commonwealth should be reviewed at an early date in order that it may be considered as to how far the burden now borne by India is equitable While we agree that Defence must continue to be a reserved subject, we are strongly impressed with the need for building up an informed opinion on Defence matters, and we therefore propose that there should be a “ Standing Defence Committee of the Legislature ”)

The further consideration of paragraph 175 is postponed

It is moved by the Earl Winterton. Page 89 after paragraph 175, to insert the following new paragraph — extent compatible with the preservation of his own responsibility, we would refer to the question of lending Indian personnel of the Defence forces for service outside India. There have been many occasions on which the Government of India have found themselves able to spare contingents for operations overseas in which considerations of Indian defence have not been involved, and we may presume that such occasions will recur. There appears to be some misconception in India on this point, which it would be desirable to remove. It is not the case that, because a Government can in particular circumstances afford a temporary reduction of this kind in its standing forces, the size of those forces is thereby proved to be excessive, or conversely, that if it is not excessive troops cannot be spared for service elsewhere. These standing forces are in the nature of an insurance against perils which may not always be insistent but which nevertheless must be provided for. There is thus no ground for assuming a prima facie objection to the loan of contingents on particular occasions. If on such occasions the Governor-General is asked whether he can lend a contingent, he must decide, first, whether the occasion involves the defence of India in the widest sense, and secondly, whether he can spare the troops having regard to all the circumstances at the time. Both these decisions would fall within the exclusive sphere of his responsibility. If he decided that troops could be spared, the only remaining constitutional issue would be narrowed down to one of broad principle, namely, that Indian leaders as represented in the Federal Ministry should be consulted before their fellow-countrymen were exposed to the risks of operations in a cause that was not their own. In view, however, of the complexities that may arise, we do not feel able to recommend that the ultimate authority of the Governor-General should be limited in this matter. Our proposal is that when the question arises of lending Indian personnel of the Defence Forces for service outside India on occasions which in the Governor-General's decision do not involve the defence of India in the broadest sense, he should not agree to lend such personnel without consultation with the Federal Ministry. We have little doubt that in practice he will give the greatest weight to the advice of the Federal Ministry before reaching his final decision. The financial aspect has also to be considered. Although in the circumstances we are discussing the defence of India would not be involved, it might on occasions be in India's general interests to make a contribution towards the cost of external operations. Proposal 150 of the White Paper reproduces the provision of s. 20 (1) of the Government of India Act that "the revenues of India shall be applied for the purposes of the government of India alone", and a contribution in the general interests of India would come within the scope of that provision. Under the new Constitution, however, the recognition of interests of this nature would fall within the province of the Federal Ministry and Legislature, since, ex hypothesi, they would not be defence interests. If, therefore, the question should arise of offering a contribution from India's revenues in the circumstances we are discussing (and the interests in question did not fall under the other reserved department of External Affairs) we are of opinion that it would need to be ratified by the Federal Legislature.")

It is moved by the Lord Snell, Mr Cocks and Mr Morgan Jones. Page 91 to leave out paragraph 181 and to insert the following new paragraph —

(181 We see no reason why the Indian Federation should not have control over the Department of Foreign Affairs. We recognise that the Viceroy, in his relations with those Indian States which do not join the Federation, and in relation to all the States in regard to those subjects which are outside the Federation will continue to control the Department which in the Government of India has been hitherto described as foreign but we consider that in its relationship to the rest of the world India is entitled to have the same control over her foreign policy as that which is conceded to the other Dominions. It may be suggested that, inasmuch as Indian Defence is to be a Reserved Subject, Foreign Affairs should also be reserved but in our view this is to turn the argument inside out. Armaments depend on foreign policy. India has for years paid for her own defence, although the foreign policy of the British Commonwealth of Nations, of which she is a member has been decided without her having an effective voice. We would point out that at the Peace Conferences and subsequently in the League of Nations India has had representation as a nation. We consider that this recognition which was given to her as a consequence of the services of her sons in the Great War should be given a full content by conceding to her the same degree of control over her external relations as is enjoyed by her sister States in the British Commonwealth)

Such ministrations, in our opinion " should form part of the organization of the Army and the Services. Whether it is wise to make such ministrations a drain on the resources of a people of other religions is we think a point that has not heretofore been sufficiently considered. While we are prepared to accept the proposition that so long as we have an Army in India their spiritual needs should be provided for we cannot see why this can only or best be achieved by the proposal of the White Paper to retain the Ecclesiastical Department permanently as a special Reserved Department of the Government of India. We think it would be very much better to abolish this Department and include religious ministrations as an integral part of the Army administration. We would go further and propose that so long as we have an Army and Services in India whose spiritual needs are entirely different from those of the peoples amongst " whom they serve it would be a gracious act on our part if the necessary

Paragraphs 188 to 192 are read

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Pages 94 to 97, to leave out paragraphs 188 to 192 inclusive, and to insert the following new paragraph — (“ 188 We have considered in an earlier part of our Report the problem of the relations between the Executive and the Legislature of a Province, and those remarks apply mutatis mutandis to the relations between the Federal Executive and Legislature. It is only necessary to have to refer briefly to two special complications which are introduced into the Federal problem, the existence of the Governor-General's Reserved Departments and the question of the representation of the States in the Ministry. On the first point, we have already spoken frankly of the difficulties presented by a system of dyarchy. We can only repeat that, faced by a choice in which every conceivable alternative involves some division of responsibility and some danger of friction, we recommend the alternative which draws the line of division at Defence and Foreign Affairs as corresponding most nearly with the realities of the situation, that, of these, the crucial question, so far as the Legislature is concerned, is Defence, and that on this question we regard an All-India Federation as the best means of ensuring that the Central Legislature, while discharging its legitimate function of discussion and criticism, will not (in the phrase of the Statutory Commission) seek ‘ to magnify its functions in the reserved field ’. On the second point, it will be observed that,

The difficulty of Dyarchy is the Centre of composite nature of Executive

under the White Paper proposals the Governor-General is to be directed by his Instrument of Instructions to include, so far as possible in his Ministry not only members of important minority communities, but also representatives of the States which accede to the Federation. It may be thought that this proposal runs the risk of adding to the possible dangers of communal representation in the Ministry to which we have referred in speaking of the Provinces, the further dangers of territorial representation. This, however is a common feature of all Federations. Few if any have in practice found it possible to constitute an Executive into which an element of territorial representation does not in some sense enter and in the Swiss Constitution the principle of such representation is explicitly laid down so that to advance this as an argument against the White Paper proposals would be, in effect to reject an All India Federation even as an ultimate ideal. Moreover the limitation of the functions of the Federal Executive to matters of essentially All India interest is calculated to minimise the dangers of both communal and territorial representation. Tariffs and excise duties currency and transport are national, not communal questions and it is not unreasonable to assume that any clash of interest with regard to them will tend in future to have an economic rather than a communal origin. There will, therefore be centripetal as well as centrifugal forces and it seems to us indeed conceivable that, until the advent of a new and hitherto unknown alignment of parties a central Executive such as we have described may even come to function, as we believe that the Executive of the Swiss Confederation functions as a kind of business committee of the Legislature)

After debate the further consideration of the above amendment is postponed

The further consideration of paragraphs 188 to 192 is postponed.

Paragraph 193 is again read and postponed.

Paragraph 194 is again read

It is moved by Mr Morgan Jones, Mr Cocks, and the Lord Snell Page 98, line 30 after (' Paper ') to insert (' It should be recognized that to attempt to provide a legislative body which shall be representative of a population of over 350 millions is without precedent. We are met at the outset by the difficulty of applying the representative system on a basis of direct representation to a unit of such magnitude. On the one hand if the constituencies were of a reasonable size the resultant chamber would be unmanageably large if on the other hand the chamber were of a reasonable size the constituencies on which it was based would necessarily be enormous.)

Paragraph 194 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 194 is postponed

Paragraph 195 is again read.

It is moved by Mr Morgan Jones, Mr Cocks and the Lord Snell Page 99 line 3 at the end to insert (" As we understand the proposals of the White Paper it is suggested that the two Chambers except for the proviso that " Money Bills will be initiated in the Assembly and that the range of the " functions of the Upper Chamber in relation to Supply will be less extensive than those of the Lower Chamber are to possess equal powers, and that in the event of differences between the two Houses the device of a Joint " Session should be employed. We consider that in effect, this really makes the Central Legislature a single Chamber meeting for certain purposes in “ two sections, and makes an unnecessary duplication of representation, which “ results in an unwieldy body of legislatures We, therefore, propose that “ there should be only one Chamber at the Centre, and we accept the pro“ portions laid down for representation from the Provinces and the States as “ applying to a single chamber ”)

The said amendment is disagreed to

Paragraph 195 is again read

The further consideration of paragraph 195 is postponed

Paragraphs 196 to 198 are again read and postponed

Paragraphs 199 to 203 are again read

It is moved by the Marquess of Reading, the Lord Ker (M Lothian), and Mr Foot Pages 100 to 102, to leave out paragraphs 199 to 203 inclusive, and to insert the following new paragraphs —

(“ 199 There are, broadly, three possible ways of constituting the electorate for the federal legislature so far as British India is concerned, apart from the indirect method adopted in the Minto-Morley reforms, which now has few, if any, supporters the ordinary system of direct election by electors in territorial constituencies the indirect system in its group form, whereby the whole electorate is divided into small groups of primary voters, say 20 to 50, who elect secondary electors, who then elect the candidate in ordinary territorial constituencies . and the indirect system in the form in which the legislature of the units which, in the case of India would be the provinces, elect the members of the federal house We will deal with these in reverse order ”

“ 200 We are opposed to the third alternative for five main reasons. In the first place it means that the provinces, in effect, will be able to control the Central Legislature and therefore the Ministry The supreme problem in India is the maintenance of its constitutional unity The breakdown of its central government is the greatest catastrophe which could overtake the country Yet to constitute the central legislature by what, in effect will be provincial delegations, the majority of whom will hold their seats on the nomination, and at times of re-election at the discretion of the Provincial Governments and the parties which support them in office would in our view aggravate the tendency to provincial separatism which already exists and endanger the unity of India. It might also confront the Governor General with situations of great gravity if he alone had to stand for Indian unity as against provincial separatism. We see no reason for abandoning in the case of India the almost invariable practice of other federations that the Upper House should represent the units and the Lower House the nation. In the second place the system inevitably involves the confusion of provincial and all India issues at times of election with bad results for both central and provincial legislatures. Legislatures ought to be elected on the issues which they are constitutionally responsible for dealing with. The indirect system under consideration means that the provincial elections may turn on all India issues such as tariffs or income tax in which case there will be no clear decision about the provincial issues which the legislatures will alone have to deal with in the next few years or that they may turn on provincial issues alone, in which case the electorate will have no voice or influence in all India issues. In the third place the system inevitably opens the door to corruption for it means that each member of the central legislature, which will deal with matters vitally affecting business and finance, will be elected by a number of provincial electors on the average not more than 7 or 8 in number. So far as we can ascertain the number of members of the Provincial Legislative Assemblies required to elect a member of the All India Legislative Assembly according to the proposals for indirect election submitted to us would be as follows —

	General Seats	Muslim Seats	Sikh Seats
Madras	8	4	—
Bombay	9	5	—
Bengal	8	7	—
U P	8	6	—
Punjab	8	7	0
Bihar	6	5	—
C P	10	5	—

In the Council of State the equivalent numbers would be about the same, though at the first election the members would go through the strange process of electing two members one after the other. The opportunities for corruption under a system which enables any seven or eight members of a provincial legislature to return a member of the Central Legislature needs no emphasis from us. Fourthly the system of electing the central legislature by the provincial legislatures is bound to be extremely intricate and confusing with its combination of electoral colleges elected by enormous constituencies in some provinces with election by the provincial Upper Houses which are themselves elected in part by the Provincial Assemblies, in others. It is likely to be cumbrous ridden and it will inevitably make necessary large numbers of provincial bye-elections whenever an election to the central legislature takes place with possibly unfortunate results on the stability of the provincial ministries. Finally this form of indirect system involves reversing a system which has already been in operation for the Indian Legislative Assembly not unsuccessfully for thirteen years and which has the support of the great majority of Indian political leaders. It is sometimes said that the members of existing legislatures are not in adequate touch with their constituents, but this is almost inevitable so long as the legislature itself is without responsibility as it constitutionally is to-day. The contact with the constituencies is likely rapidly to increase with the advent of a measure of responsible government at the centre. In the light of these considerations we feel that we have no option but to reject the method of composing the Central legislature by indirect election from the Provincial legislatures "

" 201 The arguments for the second alternative, the group system of indirect election, are very strong. On the one hand the population of British India is over 250,000,000, which would mean a population of about 500,000 in every constituency and with adult franchise an electorate of between 250,000 and 300,000 per member even with a house as large as 500. Such an electorate would be far too large to make possible that effective contact between the representative and his constituents which is the necessary basis for the successful working of Parliamentary institutions. On the other hand there is a great deal to be said for the view that in a country the overwhelming majority of whose people are still illiterate and live in villages the best basis for a representative system is that the electors for the central assembly should be men or women who have been chosen by small groups of villagers to vote on their behalf. If the groups were of say 25 persons even adult suffrage at the primary stage would only result in 10,000 secondary electors per constituency in a house of 500 or 20,000 in a house of 250. We have however, been reluctantly convinced by the report of the Indian Franchise Committee which made a serious attempt to work out a system of this kind and other evidence, that no group system is practicable to-day in India. The administrative difficulty involved in forming and polling the groups seems to be insuperable, and the problem of framing any system of election within the group which will produce a truly representative elector seems at present to be insoluble, owing to caste, communal and other divisions ")

" 202 We are, therefore, driven to the conclusion that the right basis for the constitution of the Federal House is that proposed in the White Paper, namely direct election to the Legislative Assembly from territorial constituencies by an enlarged but still restricted electorate and indirect election to the Council of State from the Provincial Legislative Assemblies by the system of the single transferable vote. We think that this will produce that balance of representation at the centre between the provincial and national interests which the history of other federations shows to be both desirable and to have stood the test of experience. It avoids the constitution of the Council of State mainly by election from provincial Upper Houses, themselves partly the product of indirect elections, which must, as it seems to us, result in a federal second chamber which is unduly representative of vested interests and not sufficiently responsive to popular feeling and needs to be given equal power with an Assembly which is itself indirectly elected by the provincial assemblies. We are prepared to agree to second chambers in the provinces 16 provided they are possessed only of the power to delay and revise hasty or ill judged legislation for more is not necessary in the restricted sphere of provincial powers. We are in favour of the White Paper proposal that the two houses of the central legislature one of which is to represent the units by indirect election from the popular provincial house and the other the nation by direct election should have equal powers. But we are opposed to any proposal whereby the two federal houses are indirectly elected by the provincial assemblies and Upper Houses respectively and possessed of equal powers "

" 203 We think that the franchise proposed in the White Paper namely the electorate which has exercised the franchise for the provinces since 1920 and has therefore gained experience, is a sensible extension and that with the proposals for the special representation of women, labour, landlords commerce and depressed classes, it secures a reasonable representation to all the main sections and interests of the community

We recognise the difficulty which candidates will have in establishing contact with their constituents in the large areas which the federal constituencies must necessarily comprise especially so long as separate electorates continue. But the facilities for communication are daily increasing. India has indigenous institutions through which public opinion is able to express itself and with which candidates can get into touch. In almost all countries the radio and quick transport make possible constituencies far larger than were practicable a few years ago. The Indian Franchise Committee has shown that with 250 members for British India the number of electors ought not to exceed 30 000 to 40 000 in each constituency, that the average rural constituency will not exceed 6 000 to 12 000 square miles, and that these constituencies will be one half the size of the constituencies which have hitherto elected to the present Assembly. We admit the force of the view that under present conditions such constituencies will be difficult to manage, but we think that the objections to such constituencies are far less serious than those which we have urged against constituting the central legislature solely by indirect election from the provincial legislatures. Constituencies of immense area and containing enormous numbers of voters are inherent in large scale Federations, and in Canada, Australia and the United States have been in existence for many decades without impairing the system of representative government. While however we support the franchise proposals in the White Paper for the federal assembly, we believe that any considerable extension of the franchise towards adult franchise under a system of direct election to the Assembly would cause an inevitable breakdown. We do not believe that constituencies both of large size and containing an electorate of between 200 000 and 3,000 000 people can be made the basis of a healthy Parliamentary system. We think that Parliament and Indian public opinion should face these facts and recognise that if the elections to the federal Assembly are to be direct in the sense that the electorate will vote directly for members of that Assembly and on federal issues alone, some system of group election will have to be contrived before any substantial extension of the federal franchise can take place. We are by no means convinced that this cannot be found. The group system apparently works with considerable success in many countries where conditions are not dissimilar to those of India, and we hope that Indian public opinion will recognise that if its declared goal of adult suffrage is to be reached, it must contrive some system of group or secondary election to make it practicable.)

It is moved by Mr Cocks, Mr Foot and Mr Morgan Jones as an amendment to the above motion, to insert the proposed new paragraphs 199 to (We) in line 16 of the proposed new paragraph 202 —

Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones and the Lord Snell to move Pages 100 and 101, to leave out paragraphs 200 and 201

The consideration of the said amendment is postponed

The further consideration of paragraphs 200 and 201 is postponed

Paragraph 202 is again read

It is moved by Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell Page 101, to leave out paragraph 202 and to insert the following new paragraph —

(“202 We have examined the proportion of members allocated to the various Provinces, and while we recognize that a smaller Province must have some addition to its population ratio, we are unable to accept the differentiation made in favour of Bombay and the Punjab at the expense of Madras, Bengal and the United Provinces. We see no reason why Bombay should be allocated almost two members per million while Madras and Bengal get less than one. We consider that all Provinces with the exceptions mentioned above should come in on an equal basis

"We have already expressed our objections to special representation being given to the landlords, the universities commerce and industry and these objections hold good at the Centre as well as in the Provinces. We recognize, however that there is a case for some representation of commerce and industry at the Centre in view of the character of the questions which will come up for decision here and we should therefore as a temporary measure be prepared to see some representation given to those interests. In other respects we accept the allocation of seats given in the White Paper subject to the following variations —

The White Paper proposes that in the Federal Assembly Labour should be given ten seats as against twenty six assigned altogether to the representatives of Commerce and Industry the landlords and the Europeans. We regard this as wholly disproportionate as it would mean that Labour would only have 4 per cent of the total seats from British India and that a few thousand Europeans would have a greater voting strength than the many millions of industrial and rural wage earners. As is pointed out by the Indian Franchise Committee, Labour legislation will be predominantly a Federal Subject under the new constitution, while the restricted franchise at the Centre will not bring on the electoral roll the same proportion of the working classes as in the case of the provincial legislatures. It is, therefore especially important that Labour representation should be adequate

We recommend, therefore, that the seats allotted to Labour should be raised to twenty six.

We note that according to the White Paper the distribution of seats is to be on a provincial basis. We suggest that this requires modification. Certain trades and industries, such as textiles and railways are distributed over more than one province. If seats should be allocated on a purely provincial basis, certain trade unions would be handicapped, while others would be given more than their reasonable quota of representation. We recommend that Labour seats should be fixed on an industrial basis with due regard to provincial considerations

"We accept the provisions of the White Paper for the Federal Franchise subject to the amendments which we have suggested in respect of the qualifications of women electors, and to our proposals in regard to Labour representation, but we desire to state that we regard the provision as only a temporary one until a means can be found of extending the franchise and of making the British Indian side of the Federal Legislature more representative of the mass of the people."

The same is disagreed to

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Perov Page 101 lines 15 to 18 to leave out from (" bodies ") in line 15 to (we) in line 18 and to insert (There are interesting precedents for this, for instance in the Dutch East Indies and there is much to be said for the view that in principle it is the best form of indirect election. Its practical merits however depend upon the character of the local bodies. In India this form of indirect election was a prominent feature of the Morley Minto Constitution and the general tenor of the evidence we have received is that the system did not work well and that this experience of it has created a strong prejudice against it in the mind of many Indians. Here again we would repeat what we have said in paragraph 129 that we do not wish to rule out the introduction of some system on these lines in the future and that the problem is essentially one “ which Indians should consider for themselves , but we are satisfied that,

 “ at the present time, it would be a mistake to base the Federal Assembly “ upon this form of election ”)

Paragraph 205 is again read

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Page 102 line 34 after (Paper) to insert (If the size of the Council of State were materially reduced and if, as we have recommended, one-third of its membership is replaced every three years, the number of members whom provincial electoral colleges would be called upon to choose at any given election would be too small for the method of the single transferable vote to produce an equitable result from the point of view of minorities and we should greatly regret the introduction of a communal basis for the Federal Upper House. There is another consideration affecting the Federal House of Assembly It would be difficult, if the size of this House were reduced, to make any proportionate reduction in the number of seats assigned to special interests, since this would in several instances deprive them of seats which they have in the existing Legislative Assembly These special interest seats, apart from those assigned to European commerce and industry would in practice be almost entirely occupied by members of the Hindu community We think it important that the Muhammadan community should have secured to it, as the White Paper proposes, one-third of all the British India seats, but if the number of the special interest seats is to remain undisturbed, the application to a substantially smaller House of the undertaking given to the Muhammadans would result in a disproportionate number of the ordinary (non-special) seats being allocated to the Muhammadans)

In any event, we think that there should be a definite formula which could be applied to every State, so that if, as may well be, the Federation is built up by the gradual accession of States, there may be at hand the means of allocating forthwith the representation to which any particular State is entitled ”)

The Indian Statutory Commission in its recommendations for Provincial Autonomy was, we think, not unaffected by the desire to give the largest possible ambit to autonomy in the Provincial sphere owing to their inability at that time to recommend responsibility at the Centre. (219 We are of opinion that the proposals in the White Paper on this subject require modification in two directions. In the first place, the White Paper draws no distinction between the administration and execution of Federal Acts with respect to subjects on which the Federal Legislature is alone competent to legislate (List 1) and the administration and execution of Federal Acts in the concurrent field (List 3). It is evident that in its exclusive field the Federal Government ought to have power to give directions to a Provincial Government as proposed in the White Paper but it is much more doubtful whether it should have such power in the concurrent field. The objects of legislation in this field will be predominantly matters of Provincial concern The Federal Legislature will be generally used as an instrument of legislation in this field merely from considerations of practical convenience, and, if this procedure were to carry with it automatically an extension of the scope of Federal administration, the Provinces might feel that they were exposed to dangerous encroachment On the other hand, the consideration of practical convenience which will prompt the use of the Federal Legislature in this field will often be the need for securing uniformity in matters of social legislation, and uniformity of legislation will be useless if there is no means of enforcing reasonable uniformity of administration While, therefore, we think that the Federal Government should have no general power of giving directions to the Provincial Governments in regard to the administration of Federal Acts in the concurrent field, it is important that the Constitution should not impose an absolute bar to the exercise of such power by the Federal Government in cases where it is recognised to be necessary”)

If it be considered to amount to a breakdown of the Constitution the Governor could be bidden by the Governor-General to use his reserve powers accordingly It is, however, easy to imagine that the quarrel, however, obstinate, might be confined to a sphere of no great importance and that the application of the ultimate weapon of authority would be disproportionate, if not grotesque We suggest that in such a situation power should be given to withhold revenue which would otherwise be due to the Province In the case of a State there appears to be no remedy under the proposals of the Government except such influence as the Viceroy might exercise in the sphere of paramountcy”)

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Page 111 line 47 to page 112, line 5, to leave out from ('us, ') in line 47 page 111 to the end of the paragraph on page 112 and to insert (and we draw attention in later paragraphs of our Report (for instance, paragraphs 227 224 and 226) to a number of matters on which it is, in our view important that the Provinces should co-ordinate their policy in addition to the financial problem which we discuss in paragraph 220 It is obvious that, if departments or institutions of co-ordination and research are to be maintained at the centre in such matters as agriculture, forestry, irrigation, education and public health and if such institutions are to be able to rely on appropriations of public funds sufficient to enable them to carry on their work the joint interest of the Provincial Governments in them must be expressed in some regular and recognised machinery of inter Governmental consultation. Moreover we think that it will be of vital importance to establish some such machinery at the very outset of the working of the new constitution, since it is precisely at that moment that institutions of this kind may be in most danger of falling between two stools through failing to enlist the active interest either of the Federal or the Provincial Governments, both of whom will have many other more immediate preoccupations. There is however much to be said for the view that, though some such machinery may be established at the outset, it cannot be expected to take its final form at that time, and that Indian opinion will be better able to form a considered judgment as to the final form which it should take after some experience in the working of the new constitution. For this reason we doubt whether it would be desirable to fix the constitution of an inter Provincial Council by statutory provisions in the Constitution Act but we feel strongly the desirability of taking definite action on the lines we have suggested as soon as the Provincial Autonomy provisions of the Constitution come into operation. We think further that, although the Constitution Act should not itself prescribe the machinery for this purpose, it should empower His Majesty's Government to regulate the working of such co-ordinating machinery as it may have been found desirable to establish in order that at the appropriate time means may thus be available for placing these matters upon a more formal basis.)

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 133 after paragraph 233 to insert the following new paragraph —

(238A. We think it right to take this opportunity of drawing attention to the control of Railway Police as settled by the distribution of subjects. Railway Police in India is at present classified as a provincial subject but the Central Government retains, under the existing Devolution Rules, the power to determine conditions as regards limits of jurisdiction and contributions by the Railways to the cost of maintenance. We are informed that for many years past the question of the allocation of the cost of the Railway Police between the provincial Governments on the one hand and the Railways on the other has been a subject of controversy and we have considered the best means of avoiding or at all events mitigating such controversies under the new Constitution. One course, which has the obvious attractions of theoretical simplicity would be to make the policing of the Railways, along with the general control of Railways, an exclusively federal subject thereby making the Federal Government solely responsible for the control of the administration, and for the financing of the whole of the Railway Police. We are satisfied, however that such an arrangement which would reverse a practice of many years standing would gravely prejudice the efficiency not merely of the Railway Police but of the Provincial Police as well. It is essential that the regular Police Force of a Province should act in close co-operation with the separately organised Railway Police and that both should be subordinate to the same Inspector General. This result could not be secured if the control of the two bodies were in separate hands. We feel no doubt therefore that the right solution is to classify Railway Police as an exclusively provincial subject that the Railway Police Force of each Province should be financed in the main from provincial revenues, but that there should be as at present a contribution from the Federal Government to the Provinces, which would, in fact consist of the appropriate contribution from the Railways, and the amount of which would necessarily have to be determined by the Federal Government. But, although the administration of the Railway Police Force itself would thus remain an exclusive responsibility of the Provinces, it is clear that inefficiency or inadequacy of strength in the Railway Police would at once affect the administration of the federal subject of Railways, and we are satisfied that the recommendations which we have made elsewhere¹ would secure to the Federal Government adequate means of ensuring that the effective administration of the federal subject of Railways did not suffer through inadequacy or inefficiency on the part of the Railway Police. The Federal Government would be entitled, if it felt called upon to do so, to direct any or all of the provincial Governments so to order its Railway Police as to bring them up to the requisite standard of efficiency, and there would be an ultimate right residing in the Governor-General, at his discretion, in case directions from his Government to any or all of the Provincial Governments on the subject of the administration, the efficiency or the strength of the Railway Police were not complied with, to give the necessary orders to the Governor, which the latter in virtue of his special responsibility to secure the execution of orders lawfully issued by the Governor-General, would be in a position to get executed both administratively and so far as supply was concerned. The position is different in the States, where for the most part jurisdiction over railway lands has been ceded to the Crown and is exercised either through Police specially appointed for that purpose or through the agency of Provincial Railway Police. In cases where railway jurisdiction has been retained and is exercised by the State the proposals in the White Paper² defining the administrative relations between the Federal Government and the States provide the Governor-General with an appropriate corresponding power to secure the same result as that to be secured under our proposal in the Provinces.")

It is moved by Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell Page 135, after paragraph 238A, to insert the following new paragraph —

("238B It is proposed in the White Paper that such subjects as Health Insurance and Invalid and Old Age Pensions should be subjects of Provincial Legislation. We see serious objection to this, and consider that they should be included in the Concurrent List. While it is necessary that the more industrialized Provinces should be able to legislate on these subjects in the interests of the urban workers and should not have to wait for the concurrence of those which are predominantly rural, it is undesirable to exclude the possibility of All-India legislation which may well become necessary in order that there should be uniformity of treatment of the workers as between Province and Province and that industry in one Province should be burdened with obligations not imposed in another. Mr N M Joshi, in the Memorandum submitted by him, argued that social insurance should also be included in the list of Federal subjects, but here, again, we consider it would be better that it should be in the concurrent list. We consider that in order to obtain an All-India Code of Labour and social legislation it is necessary that the Federal Legislature should have power to pass legislation imposing financial liabilities on the Provincial Governments, but that where this is done grants-in-aid from Federal revenues should be paid to the Provinces and also to such Indian States as are prepared to put in force such legislation. It should, in our view, follow that there should be a central inspection and a measure of control, wherever such grants are made. We consider

¹Supra, paras 218-221

²White Paper proposal, para 129

that there seems much to be said for utilising the machinery of adoptive Acts as used in Great Britain in connection with Local Government legislation. We have to endeavour to steer a course between delay caused by the difficulty of getting less advanced Provinces to agree to such legislation and the possibility of friction in such matters as factory legislation as between Province and Province or the Provinces and the States. The mechanism of the adoptive Act supported by grants-in-aid in return for inspection seems to us unobjectionable in theory and useful in practice.'))

Paragraph 257 is again read.

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Page 152, line 20 at the end to insert (A claim has also been made by Assam to a share in the proceeds of the excise duty on petroleum. It is certain that Assam urgently needs an assured increase in its revenue, but the question in what form this need is to be met, whether by fixed subvention or by assignment of revenues, is a matter of fiscal administration on which we do not feel called upon to express an opinion.)

Paragraph 257 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 257 is postponed.

Paragraph 258 is again read.

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 152, lines 21 to 23, to leave out from (taxes) in line 21 to (in) in line 23 and to insert (of which Stamp Duties are the only ones at present imposed, though there may be a limited scope in the near future for Railway terminal taxes)

The same is agreed to.

Paragraph 258 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 258 is postponed

Paragraph 259 is again read.

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Page 153, lines 7 to 13, to leave out from (governments,) in line 7 to the end of the paragraph, and to insert ("We have already given our reasons for thinking that it is undesirable to include in the Constitution Act statutory provisions in regard to an inter-Provincial Council. Clearly, if it should prove impossible, at any rate in the early years of the Federation to devise an automatic basis for the distribution of income tax to the Provinces, some form of consultation between the Governor General and the Provincial Governments as to the methods of distribution will have to be devised, but in that event the point can, if necessary, be met by the Order-in-Council procedure which we have already suggested")

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 259 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 259 is postponed

Paragraph 260 is again read and postponed

It is moved by Mr. Butler and Sir Samuel Hoare After paragraph 260 to insert the following new paragraph —

("260A. It will be convenient to refer here to the power which the States already possess to impose customs duties on their land frontiers. It is greatly to be desired that States adhering to the Federation like the Provinces, should accept the principle of internal freedom for trade in India and that the Federal Government alone should have the power to impose tariffs and other restrictions on trade. Many States, however, derive substantial revenues from customs duties levied at their frontiers on goods entering the State from other parts of India. These duties are usually referred to as internal customs duties, but in many of the smaller States are often more akin to octroi and terminal taxes than to customs. In some of the larger States the right to impose these duties is specifically limited by treaty. We recognise that it is impossible to deprive States of revenue upon which they depend for balancing their budgets and that they must be free to alter existing rates of duty to suit varying conditions. But internal customs barriers are in principle inconsistent with the freedom of interchange of a fully developed federation and we are strongly of the opinion that every effort should be made to substitute other forms of taxation for these internal customs. The charge must, of course, be left to the discretion of the States concerned as alternative sources of revenue become available. We have no reason for thinking that the States contemplate any enlargement of the general scope of their "tariffs" and we do not believe that it would be in their interest to enlarge it. But in any case we consider that the accession of a State to the Federation should imply its acceptance of the principle that it will not set up a barrier to free interchange so formidable as to constitute a threat to the future of the Federation, and, if there should be any danger of this, we think that the powers entrusted to the Governor-General in his discretion in Paragraph 129 of the White Paper would have to be brought to bear upon the States")

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 265 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 265 is postponed.

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Page 155 after paragraph 265 to insert the following new paragraph —

Other deficit
Provinces.

(265A The subventions to other deficit Provinces also react on federal finance but these would have been necessary before long under the existing Constitution, since it is clearly impossible to allow the continued accumulation of deficits by a Province, if over a number of years it is beyond its power within the resources assigned to it to balance its expenditure and revenue. The subvention to the North West Frontier Province has already been granted, and the claim of Assam to an increase in its revenues has for some time been recognised as one which the Central Government must meet in some form.)

We would suggest that the most fruitful fields for the practice of this economy would be (a) in the Army expenditure (b) in the transfer at as early a date as possible of the terms of future recruitment, pay etc of the services to the Governments in India and (c) in having single-Chamber Government, both for the Federation and the Provinces.)

The Order of Adjournment is read.

The Proceedings of Yesterday are read.

Paragraph 289 is again read.

It is moved by the Lord Ker (M. Lothian) Page 187 line 4, after (consideration) to insert (The system of responsible government, to be successful in practical working requires the existence of a competent and independent Civil Service staffed by persons capable of giving advice to successive ministries, based on long administrative experience, secure in their positions during good behaviour but required to carry out the policy upon which the Government and the legislatures eventually decide.)

The same is agreed to.

Paragraph 290 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 290 is postponed.

Paragraph 290 is again read.

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy and Major Cadogan. Page 187 lines 30 to 33, to leave out from ('man') in line 30 to ('not') in line 33 and to insert (whether British or Indian. Parliament may, therefore, rightly require, in the interests of India as well as of this country)

The same is agreed to.

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy and Major Cadogan. Page 187 line 34 at the end to insert (It is, indeed, the interests of India that must be considered above all. The difficulties of the new Constitution will be aggravated in every respect if the administrative machinery is not thoroughly sound. One of the strongest supports of the new Governments and their new Ministers that we can recommend and that the Constitution can provide for will be impartial efficient and upright Services in every grade and department. It has been impressed on us from various responsible sources, mainly Indian, that the success of the transfer of local self governing bodies to non-official hands has been jeopardized by the lack of the strong and adequate staff both inspecting and administrative, required by the new heads of such bodies, when they took over their duties from experienced officials. Whether or not these criticisms are justified, they indicate the obvious danger in the larger sphere of provincial government, which would follow from any deterioration in the Services)

The same is agreed to.

All amendments are to the Draft Report (vide infra paras 1—4 B pp 470—491; and vide supra paras. 43—453 pp. 64—53) and NOT to the Report as published (Vol. I Part I).

A Key is attached (see pp. 5 1—511) showing on which pages of the Proceedings amendments to each paragraph can be found.

Paragraph 270 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 270 is postponed.

Paragraphs 271 to 278 are again read and postponed

Paragraph 279 is again read

The following amendment is laid before the Committee

Sh Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler to move Page 160, line 7, after ("the") to insert ("principal")

The consideration of the said amendment is postponed

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy and Major Cadogan Page 160, lines 1—8, to leave out from the beginning of the paragraph to ("are") in line 8 and to insert, ("In addition, the White Paper proposes that there should be secured to every person in the Public Services at the commencement of the Constitution Act all service rights possessed by him at that date¹ The principal existing service rights of officers appointed by the Secretary of State and of persons appointed by authority other than the Secretary of State are set out in Parts 1 and 2 respectively of Appendix VII of the White Paper Officers appointed by the Secretary of State are also to have a special right to such compensation for the loss of any existing right as the Secretary of State may consider just and equitable It may be observed that some of the existing service rights of officers appointed by the Secretary of State set out in Part 1 of Appendix VII")

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 279 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 279 is postponed

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy and Major Cadogan Page 160, after paragraph 279 to insert the following new paragraph —

"(279A In addition to these rights and safeguards common to all members of the Public Services, it is proposed that, after the commencement of the Act, the Secretary of State, who will continue to make appointments to the Indian Civil Service, the Indian Police and the Ecclesiastical Department, shall regulate the conditions of service of all persons so appointed, and it is intended that the conditions of service thus laid down shall in substance be the same as at present The power to regulate the conditions of service of officers not appointed by the Secretary of State, on the other hand, has, since 1926, been delegated to the Government of India in the case of the Central Services and to Provincial Governments in the case of Provincial Services, and the White Paper contains no provision as to the conditions of service to be applied to officers of these Services appointed after the commencement of the Constitution Act")

The same is agreed to

New Paragraph 279A is again read

The further consideration of paragraph 279A is postponed.

Paragraph 280 is again read

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy and Major Cadogan Page 160, line 21, at the beginning of the paragraph to insert ("Further,")

The same is agreed to

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy and Major Cadogan Page 160, line 23, after ("compensation") to insert ("to any officer appointed by him")

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 280 is again read, as amended

Paragraphs 281 and 282 are again read and postponed

Paragraph 283 is again read.

It is moved by the Lord Rustace Percy and Major Cadogan Page 161 to leave out paragraph 283 and to insert the following new paragraphs —

(283. While we consider that the White Paper provides adequately for the special protection of members of the Secretary of State's Services, we are not fully satisfied that the status of other members of the Public Services and of those Services as a whole, has been made sufficiently clear either in the White Paper or in any of the investigations and discussions which have led up to its preparation. We have already discussed in paragraph 89 the measures necessary to safeguard the moral and efficiency of the Police Service, including its subordinate ranks. In paragraphs 321—325 we shall make certain special proposals in regard to judicial appointments. In addition however to these special recommendations, we think it our duty to make certain general observations on the future of the Public Services as a whole.

283A. It is natural that the process by which during recent years the power to appoint officers in the Provincial Transferred Services and to regulate their conditions of service has been transferred to the Provincial Governments, should have tended to create a false distinction between the status of the All India Services and that of the Provincial Services. The tendency has almost inevitably been to regard the Provincial Services as having ceased to be Crown Services, and as having become Services of the Provincial Governments. This tendency has been emphasised by the argument frequently advanced and accepted in the past both by Indians and Englishmen that Provincial self government necessarily entails control by the Provincial Government over the appointment of its servants. This argument has, no doubt great logical force but it runs the risk of distorting one of the accepted principles of the British Constitution namely that Civil Servants are the servants of the Crown and that the Legislature should have no control over their appointment or promotion and only a very general control over their conditions of service. Indeed, even the British Cabinet has come to exercise only a very limited control over the Services control being left very largely to the Prime Minister as, so to speak the personal adviser of the Crown in regard to all service matters. The same principle applies, of course equally to the Services recruited by the Secretary of State for India, though this fact has been sometimes obscured by inaccurate references to the control of Parliament over the All India services. But whatever misunderstandings may have arisen in the past as to the real status of the Provincial services, there ought to be no doubt as to their status under the new Constitution. We have already pointed out that under that Constitution all the powers of the Provincial Governments including the power to recruit public servants and to regulate their conditions of service will be derived no longer by devolution from the Government of India, but directly by delegation from the Crown i.e. directly from the same source as that from which the Secretary of State derives his powers of recruitment. The Provincial Services, no less than the Central Services and the Secretary of State's services, will therefore be essentially Crown Services, and the efficiency and moral of those services will largely depend in the future on the development in India of the same conventions as have grown up in England.

283B. But if such conventions are to develop in India as in England, they must develop from the same starting point—from a recognition that the Governor as the personal representative of the Crown and the head of the executive government has a special relation to all the Crown Services. He will, indeed, be generally bound to act in that relation on the advice of his Ministers, subject to his special responsibility for the rights and legitimate interests of the Services, but his Ministers will be no less bound to remember that advice on matters affecting the organisation of the permanent executive services is a very different thing from advice on matters of legislative policy, and that the difference may well affect the circumstances and the form in which such advice is tendered. We think, therefore, that the Constitution should contain in its wording a definite recognition of the Governor-General and the Governors respectively as, under the Crown, the heads of the Central (as distinct from the All-India) and Provincial Services and as the appointing authorities for those services. It will follow (see paragraph 277 above) that no public servant will be subject to dismissal, save by order of the Governor-General or Governor.

"283C But, further than this, it will, in our view, be essential that the Central and Provincial Legislatures respectively should give general legal sanction to the status and rights of the Central and Provincial Services. Their status and rights should not be in substance, inferior to those set out in List 1 of Appendix VII of the White Paper. The rights of persons appointed by the Secretary of State, enumerated in that List, are not peculiar or exceptional, they are simply the rights generally recognised to be essential to the moral of any administrative service. They are rights, in the first place, to protection against individual injury amounting to breach of contract and against individual unfair treatment through disciplinary action or refusal of promotion, and, in the second place, to protection against such alterations in the organisation of the services themselves as might damage the professional prospects of their members generally. The special responsibility of the Governor-General and Governors would, in any case, in our judgment, extend to all these points, but it is on all grounds desirable that the Executive Government as a whole should be authorised and required by law to give the Services the necessary security. Provincial Civil Service Acts, passed for this purpose, could not, indeed, determine in detail the rates of pay, allowances and pensions and the conditions of retirement of all Civil Servants, nor the procedure to be followed in considering their promotion on the one hand, or, on the other, their dismissal, removal, reduction or formal censure. Such Acts could, however, confer general powers and duties for these purposes on the Government, and in regard to promotions, they could provide definitely that "canvassing" for promotion or appointments shall disqualify the candidate, and that orders of posting or promotion in the higher grades shall require the personal concurrence of the Governor. It is admittedly more difficult to give security to the Services as a whole in respect of their general organisation, yet the moral of any service must largely depend upon reasonable prospects of promotion, and this must mean that there is a recognised cadre of higher-paid posts which while naturally subject to modification in changing circumstances, will not be subject to violent and arbitrary disturbance. A Legislature does nothing derogatory to its own rights and powers if it confers upon the Executive by law the duty of fixing such cadres and of reporting to the Legislature if any post in these cadres is at any time held in abeyance.

"283D There is, however, one existing right of officers appointed by the Secretary of State, the application of which, as it stands, to civil servants in general would be impossible, namely, the right to non-votability, of salaries and pensions. There is, indeed, nothing derogatory, again, to the rights and powers of a Legislature in the adoption of a special procedure, similar to the Consolidated Fund procedure of the British Parliament, under which certain expenditures of the Government are authorised en bloc by bill instead of being voted in detail on estimates of supply, and this is, in fact, generally recognised to be a desirable procedure in certain circumstances. But, as we point out below in paragraph 304, in a slightly different connection, this procedure could not, in practice be applied to the salaries of all public servants. We think, however that it might well be applied by the Provincial Legislatures to certain classes of officers including officers exercising judicial functions and the higher grades of all the services. We make this proposal without prejudice to the proposals in the White Paper which provide that certain heads of expenditure shall not be submitted to the vote of the Provincial Legislatures at all.)

The amendment by leave of the Committee is withdrawn.

The same is agreed to.

Paragraph 285 is again read, as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 285 is postponed.

Paragraph 286 is again read.

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock, Page 162, lines 34 to 38, to leave out from the beginning of line 34 to ('are') in line 38 and to insert ('We appreciate the force of this line of argument, though we have already pointed out the dangerous conclusions which might be drawn from it. But the loyalty with which officers of the All India Services have served the Local Governments under whom they work, notwithstanding that these Services are under the control of the Government of India and the Secretary of State has a long tradition behind it nor has any Local Government felt difficulty in regard to maintaining discipline and securing full obedience of the Services on account of that control. Moreover the evidence given before us confirmed the earlier conclusions of the Lee Commission and of the Statutory Commission that with negligible exceptions, the officers of these Services have maintained excellent relations with the Indian Ministers under whom they have been working. Subject to certain qualifications to which we refer hereafter we are of opinion that recruitment by the Secretary of State for the All India Services, where it still continues, should come to an end except in the case of the Indian Civil Service and the Indian Police the functions performed by members of these two services)

The same is agreed to.

It is moved by Mr Morgan Jones, Mr Cocks, and the Lord Snell. Page 162, line 38, to page 163 line 15 to leave out from ('hereafter') in line 38, page 162, to the end of the paragraph and to insert ('We fully recognise the fact that the functions performed by members of the Indian Civil Service and the Indian Police are essential to the general administration of the country and the vital need of maintaining a supply of recruits of the highest quality. But we feel that induction of these services should proceed at a more rapid pace. Meanwhile recruitment to these services should be by the Governor General to his discretion, and the control of conditions of service should be in his hands. We are aware that this modification of the present practice will be one of form rather than of substance, since the Governor General will be acting under the direction of the Secretary of State but Indian public opinion attaches considerable "importance to this formal change, and we are satisfied that the "psychological effect at this juncture upon the Indian people will be "of great value")

services, the decision on the results of the enquiry (with which it is intended that the Governments in India shall be associated) resting with His Majesty's Government subject to the approval of both Houses of Parliament. We agree with the principle of this proposal. Our aim, as we have already said, is to ensure that the new constitutional machinery shall not be exposed during a critical period to the risks implicit in a change of system. We recognise that the whole matter must be made the subject of a further enquiry in due time. We cannot, however, endorse the proposal to fix a definite date for such an enquiry or even a date after which the desirability of holding such an enquiry shall be considered. Past experience shows the doubtful wisdom of such a fixing of dates, and we think that no provision of this kind should be inserted in the Constitution. In our view a change in the method of recruitment of the All India services will depend less upon the lapse of any given period of time than upon the extent to which the Provincial Governments find it possible to organise and regulate the Public Services under their control on the lines which we have ventured to suggest above.)

Although as we have said a Governor is equally interested that all classes of officers should receive the emoluments and pensions to which they are entitled, yet his special responsibility' is limited to the emoluments and pensions of officers appointed by the Secretary of State. We approve the proposal in the White Paper that these pensions should be in charge against the Federal Government direct, the necessary adjustments being subsequently made between the Federal Government and Province or Provinces concerned, but the pensioner's method of redress would be by suit against the Secretary of State in London and not against the Federal Government. There is, however one particular feature about the pensions of the Indian Civil Service which it seems right to mention. While in other All India Services and in the Indian Army pensions are non-contributory this was not the case in the Indian Civil Service up to April 1919. had to make a compulsory contribution of 4 per cent of his pay towards the cost of his pension of £1,000 sterling per annum. No separate account of these contributions was ever kept, and they merged in the general revenues of India. The change was made in April, 1919, upon the recommendation of the Islington Commission, and from that time the deduction of 4 per cent in the case of every officer is credited to his account in a Provident Fund, and the amount standing to his credit is paid to him on the date of his retirement, in rupees, so that officers who entered the Service in or after April, 1919, have not contributed towards their pensions, but the oldest pensioners who retired at or before that time contributed during the whole of their service, while even among officers now serving, those of over 15 years' service were on the contributory system for service prior to 1919. In the absence of any accounts it is impossible to estimate what proportion of an officer's pension was contributed either by himself or by the Service at large. It is also proper to mention that the pensions paid to officers of all the Services, unless they continue an Indian domicile, are not subject to any deduction on account of Indian Income Tax. We think it right that these facts should be mentioned as a reassurance to pensioners.")

Paragraph 306 is again read

The further consideration of paragraph 306 is postponed

Paragraph 307 is again read

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock Page 170, to leave out paragraph 307 and to insert the following new paragraph —

("307 The various Family Pension Funds stand on a different footing from other pensionary obligations of the Government of India. The funds of the Indian Civil Service and the Indian Army have a long history behind them. The Family Pension Funds of the other Services are of recent institution, but all are alike in their nature, viz., that they consist entirely of contributions of the Services to cover provisions for their widows, minor sons and unmarried daughters. The Civil funds were started in the days of the East India Company and were three in number, Madras, Bombay and Bengal. They were managed by special Committees of the Services and invested by them in various Government of India Securities, some of which in those days used to pay as much as 8 per cent. Between the years 1874 and 1882, as a result of long negotiations between the Secretary of State and the Committees administering the funds, the whole of the accumulated funds were handed over to the Secretary of State, the transaction receiving effect by Acts of Parliament. The Secretary of State under these Acts undertook the obligation of paying pensions to widows and orphans at fixed rates which varied according to the amount of the funds accumulated by the three Presidencies in question. The subscribers to those Funds continued to pay the appointed contributions for the remainder of their services, indeed, for a long time contributions were contributed by officers even after their retirement. With effect from 1882, all officers who joined the Service became compulsory contributors to a new I.C.S. Family Pension Fund which took the place of the three Funds which the Secretary of State had taken over. At the time that all these contracts were made and legalised by Acts of Parliament the guarantees were ample, for there was then no question of any relaxation by the Secretary of State over the finances of India. Since the Montagu Announcement there has arisen alarm and anxiety regarding the security of these pensions, for the recipients may still be dependent upon them for a period which in some cases may extend to the end of this century

We understand that as regards the old Madras, Bombay and Bengal funds not even pro forma accounts have been kept. The obligations of the Government of India and of the Secretary of State being absolute since the accumulations of those funds were made over to the Government of India on the condition that the Government and the Secretary of State would pay pensions at the agreed rates up to the last survivor.

In the case of the I O S Family Pension Fund created in 1882, pro forma accounts have been kept up and the position of these funds is periodically reviewed by an Actuary appointed by the Secretary of State and with reference to the assets available, pensions to widows and orphans have been raised permanently to some extent and with temporary additions which are conditional on the assets available being sufficient. These pensioners now desire that the assets of the I O S Family Pension Fund should be remitted to this country and invested in sterling securities. The Secretary of State has, we understand, addressed all those interested either as contributors to the Funds or as recipients of pension from it asking their approval for a scheme under which the remittance to this country of these funds would be effected over a period of 15 years. The Secretary of State has informed us that His Majesty's Government will undertake no guarantee in the matter on the ground that under the new Constitution payment of these obligations by the Government of India will be secured by the Secretary of State and that therefore there is no case for a guarantee by His Majesty's Government. We cannot overlook however the fact that the whole of these contributions have been absorbed in the Indian Revenue and that the interest on these contributions has never been included in the interest charges of the financial statements of the Indian Government. It is not known now exactly what form the new Constitution will take much less can the future developments be foretold. The anxiety felt by the beneficiaries is very genuine and we suggest that His Majesty's Government might at least guarantee the payment each year of the pensions due pending their collection by the Secretary of State from the Indian Revenues. This guarantee would naturally cease to have effect as soon as the assets of the Fund have been remitted to this country and invested in sterling securities. If His Majesty's Government and the Secretary of State are correct in their view that the control retained by the Secretary of State over Indian finances will suffice to secure this money then the contingent liability incurred by His Majesty's Government will be comparatively small and merely temporary.)

The following amendment is laid before the Committee.

The Lord Hutchison of Montrose on behalf of the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst to move as an amendment to the above amendment, to leave out the last sentence of the amendment and to insert (We are strongly of opinion that in any case the period of 15 years proposed by the Secretary of State for the remittance to this country of the Family Pension Funds should be reduced to a term of 10 years.)

We agree entirely with the Commission that the arrangement whereby in consequence of the historical connexion for certain purposes between the Calcutta High Court and the Government of India, decisions as to the strength of that Court and its establishment and as to its financial requirements for buildings or other purposes rest with the Central Government, though the extra expenditure involved by such decisions falls upon the Bengal Government, is an anomaly which ought to be terminated, but, in our view, it should be terminated not by placing financial responsibility for the Calcutta High Court (and incidentally for all other High Courts) upon the shoulders of the Federal Government, but by bringing the Calcutta Court into the same relationship with the Bengal Government as that obtaining between all other High Courts and their respective Provincial Governments. We agree, moreover, most fully with the Commission's view as to the importance of securing for the High Courts a position of independence and the largest possible measure of freedom from pressure exerted for political ends. This object should, we think, be fully Administrative control of High Courts should remain with provincial Government.

secured by the recommendation which we made in the last paragraph. But, subject to the fulfilment of this requirement the High Court is, in our view essentially a provincial institution indeed as subsequent paragraphs show we seek to secure for each High Court an administrative connexion with the Subordinate Judiciary of the Province which we regard as of the highest importance and which we think could not be maintained—or only in an atmosphere of mistrust and suspicion which would gravely detract from its advantages—if the Court were an outside body regarded (as it would probably be) as an appanage of the Federal Government. Apart from these reasons, which we regard as conclusive in favour of maintaining the present relationship between the High Courts and the Provincial Governments (subject only to the modification required to bring the Calcutta High Court into the same position as that of the others) we are satisfied that the financial adjustments which would be involved in any attempt to centralise the administration and financing of the High Courts would be of a far more complicated nature than the Commission appear to have supposed)

Paragraph 320 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 320 is postponed.

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 177 after paragraph 320 to insert the following new paragraph —

(320A. We think it desirable to explain the general effect of our recommendations upon the provincial High Courts. Their constitution will as at present be laid down in the Constitution Act and the appointments to them will remain with the Crown the Constitution Act will moreover itself regulate more precisely than at present the nature and extent of the superintendence to be exercised by a High Court over the Subordinate Courts of the Province—the nature and extent in fact of what may be described as their administrative jurisdiction. No change will be made in their relations with the Province in regard to the administrative questions affecting their establishment and buildings, except that the Calcutta High Court will henceforth have relations in these respects with the Bengal Government direct, and not as at present with the Central Government (which even as matters stand, naturally consults the Bengal Government upon any proposals made before it by the Court). but the supply required by the High Court will be determined by the Governor after consultation with his Ministers, and will not be subject to the vote of the provincial Legislature. As regards the juridical jurisdiction of the High Courts, insofar as this depends—as it mainly does depend—upon provisions of Indian enactments it will henceforth be determined by enactments of that Legislature which is competent to regulate the subject in respect of which questions of the High Court's jurisdiction arise that is to say, it will be for the Federal Legislature alone to determine the jurisdiction of the High Court in respect of any matter upon which that Legislature has exclusive power to legislate, for the provincial Legislature to determine the jurisdiction of its High Court in respect of any exclusively Provincial Subject, and for both to determine (subject to the principles governing legislation in the concurrent field) in respect of any matter on which both Legislatures are competent to legislate. It will thus be seen that the High Courts, under our proposals, will be institutions which will not accurately be describable as either federalised or provincialised. They will form an integral part of the constitutional machinery and the various aspects of their activities as such will be regulated by the authority appropriate for the purpose ')

Paragraphs 1 to 66 are again postponed.

Paragraph 87 is again read as amended.

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Paragraph 87 page 41 line 20, to leave out from (Minister) in line 20 to the end of the paragraph (i.e. to leave out amendment inserted on the 25th June) and to insert (If, therefore, the transfer is to be made as we think it should, it "is essential that the Force should be protected so far as possible against these risks, and in the following paragraphs we make recommendations designed to secure this protection. ")

The same is agreed to.

Paragraph 87 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 87 is postponed.

Paragraphs 68 to 92 are again considered.

The motion of the Marquess of Zetland, the Earl of Derby the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst, the Lord Hutchison of Montrose Major Cadogan Sir Austen Chamberlain, and the Lord Eustace Percy Paragraph 90 page 43, line 11 after (reconstitute.) to insert ("The problem is a difficult one and, though, at the moment, it is perhaps only of immediate importance in the Province of Bengal and to a lesser extent in the provinces which border on Bengal terrorism and revolutionary conspiracy have not been confined to those territories, nor consequently is the necessity for efficient counter revolutionary measures limited to them. Bengal however as has been proved to us by the evidence we have received, has a particularly long and disquieting record of murder and outrage of which Indians and Europeans have equally been the victims. It has also shown in a marked degree a rise or fall in such terrorist crime according as the hands of the authorities have been weakened or strengthened, and as precautionary and special measures have been relaxed or enforced) is again considered.

The following amendments to paragraphs 90 to 92 are again laid before the Committee —

The Marquess of Zetland, the Earl of Derby, the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst, the Lord Hutchison of Montrose, Major Cadogan, Sir Austen Chamberlain, and the Lord Eustace Percy to move Paragraph 91, page 43, lines 12 and 13, to leave out lines 12 and 13 inclusive

The Lord Hutchison of Montrose and Sir Austen Chamberlain to move Paragraph 91, page 43, lines 28 and 29, to leave out from ("that") in line 28 to ("and") in line 29 and to insert ("the practice is that in a secret service case the names of agents are not disclosed to Ministers")

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne to move Paragraph 91, page 43, Line 33, to leave out from ("order,") to the end of the line and to insert ("must be understood as themselves adopting")

The Earl of Lytton to move Paragraph 91, page 43, lines 36 to 38, to leave out from the second ("agents") in line 36 to the end of the sentence and to insert ("themselves would not feel secure that their identity might not be revealed")

The Marquess of Zetland, the Earl of Derby, the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst, the Lord Hutchison of Montrose, Major Cadogan, Sir Austen Chamberlain, and the Lord Eustace Percy to move Paragraph 92, pages 43 and 44, leave out paragraph 92 and to insert the following new paragraph —

("92 In the circumstances set out above we are convinced that it should be made plain that the control of the organisation which exists, or may hereafter exist, for the purpose of combating the terrorist movement, is in the hands of the Governor-General at the centre and of the Governors in the provinces. To secure the object which we have in view, we recommend that the Central Intelligence Bureau be placed under the control of the Governor-General, as part of the Political and Foreign Department, and that in any province in which a special branch of the Police force exists or may hereafter be brought into being, the Inspector-General shall take his orders direct from the Governor as the agent of the Governor-General in all matters affecting the work of the special branch in whatever branch of police administration such matters may arise. We realise that in such circumstances, the Minister in charge of the portfolio of Law and Order might be unwilling to answer in the Legislature for action taken on the initiative of the Governor, and in that event we recommend that it shall be open to the Governor to appoint some person selected at his discretion to act as his spokesman in the Legislature")

("92 The existence of terrorist crime is a special disease which calls for special treatment. It necessitates departures from the ordinary law and the enactment of special legislation such as the Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act. The Special Branch is an essential feature of the machinery for combating terrorist activities, and as such we consider that it requires special treatment. We therefore recommend that this small and exceptional service where it exists should be a reserved service responsible to the Governor alone.")

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne to move Paragraph 92, page 43, line 45, after ("Province") to insert (" (who should continue to have direct access to him) ")

Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell to move Paragraph 92, page 44, lines 10 to 13, to leave out from ("enforced") in line 10 to ("We") in line 13

The consideration of the said amendments is postponed.

Paragraphs 88 to 91 are again read as amended.

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Paragraphs 88 to 91, pages 41 to 44, to leave out paragraphs 88 to 91 as amended and to insert the following new paragraphs —

The Governor's
responsibility

(88. First, there are the proposals already made in the White Paper. The Governor is to have a special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of the Province, or any part thereof. The effect of this, as of all other special responsibilities, is to enable the Governor if he thinks that the due discharge of his special responsibility so requires, to reject any proposals of his Ministers or himself to initiate action which his Ministers decline to take. Further there flows from this special responsibility not only the right to overrule his Ministers, but also special powers—legislative and financial—to enable him to carry into execution any course of action which requires legislative provision or the provision of supply. If, therefore, the Governor should be of opinion that the action or inaction of Ministers is jeopardising the peace or tranquillity of the Province it will be his duty to take action to meet the situation. If the situation is one requiring immediate action, he will issue any executive order which he may consider necessary. If the situation is one which cannot be dealt with by an isolated executive order—if the Minister in Charge of the Department appears unable to administer his charge on lines which the Governor regards as consistent with the due discharge of his special responsibility—the Governor will dismiss and replace the Minister (and, if necessary, the Ministers as a body with or without resort to a dissolution of the Legislature). If he fails to find an alternative Government capable of administering Law and Order on lines consistent with the discharge of his special responsibility he will be obliged to declare a breakdown of the constitution, and to assume to himself all such powers as he judges requisite to retrieve the situation. We are not contemplating such a course of events as probable but, if it occurs, provision is made to meet it.

The Police Rules.

89 We turn now to our own further recommendations for the specific protection of the Police Force itself. Of course, the due discharge of his special responsibility for peace and tranquillity will, in itself, entitle the Governor to intervene immediately if by reason of ill-timed measures of economy or the attempted exertion of political influence on the Police Force or from any other cause, the morals or the efficiency of that Force is endangered. Further, the Governor has another special responsibility. It is his duty to secure to the members of the Police as of other Public Services, any rights provided for them by the Constitution Act and to safeguard their legitimate interests. These are important safeguards, but there is a special factor in police administration which requires to be specially protected. We refer to the body of Regulations known as the Police Rules promulgated from time to time under powers given by the various Police Acts. A large number of the Rules deal with matters of quite minor importance and are constantly amended, in practice, on the responsibility of the Inspector-General of Police himself. It would be unnecessary to require the Governor's consent to every amendment of this kind. But the subject matter of some of the Rules is so vital to the well being of the Police Force that they ought not, in our opinion, to be amended without the Governor's consent and the same consideration applies a fortiori to the Acts themselves, which form the statutory basis of the Rules. Our aim should be to ensure that the internal organisation and discipline of the Police continue to be regulated by the Inspector-General and to protect both him and the Ministers themselves from political pressure in this vital field. We therefore recommend that the consent of the Governor given in his discretion should be required to any legislation which would amend or repeal the General Police Act in force in the Province or any other Police Acts (such as the Bombay City Police Act, the Calcutta Police Act, the Madras City Police Act, and Acts regulating Military Police in Provinces where such forces exist) We further recommend that any requirement in any of these Acts that Rules made under them shall be made or approved by the local Government is to be construed as involving the consent of the Governor, given in his discretion, to the making or amendment of any Rules which, in his opinion, relate to, or affect, the organisation or discipline of the Police

"90 But there is another vital department of Police administration to which we must draw attention. It has been represented to us very forcibly that, whatever may be the decision with regard to the transfer of Law and Order generally, special provision ought to be made with regard to that branch of the Police which is concerned with the suppression of terrorism. We do not here refer to those members of the Police who are occupied in combating terrorism as part of their regular functions in the prevention of crime and the maintenance of order, nor again to the Criminal Investigation Department which exists in every Province to assist the ordinary police in the detection of ordinary crime. We have in mind that organisation which is sometimes known as the Special Branch, a body of carefully selected officers whose duty is the collection and sifting of information on which executive police action against terrorism is taken. Their work necessarily involves the employment of confidential informants and agents and it is obvious that these sources of information would at once dry up if their identity became known, or were liable to become known, outside the particular circle of Police officers concerned. Though, at the moment, this problem is perhaps of immediate importance only in the Province of Bengal and, to a lesser extent, in the Provinces which border on Bengal, terrorism and revolutionary conspiracy have not been confined to those territories, nor consequently is the necessity for efficient counter-revolutionary measures limited to them. Bengal, however, as has been proved to us by the evidence we have received, has a particularly long and disquieting record of murder and outrage, of which Indians and Europeans have both been the victims. It has also shown, in a marked degree, a rise or fall in such terrorist crime according as the hands of the authorities have been weakened or strengthened, and as precautionary and special measures have been relaxed or intensified.

The Special Branch.

"91 For these reasons, it is, in our view, essential that the records of any such Intelligence Department should be protected from even the slightest danger of leakage. Experience in every country shows how strict this protection must be. It has been argued that an Indian Minister, who may have to defend subsequently before the Legislature an arrest or prosecution made or begun by his orders, must have the right to satisfy himself that the information on which he is invited to act is in all respects trustworthy, and that the names of the informants or agents from whom it has been obtained could not in the last resort be withheld from him. We think that those who argue thus are not acquainted with the general practice in matters of this kind. We are informed by those who have experience of such matters in this country that the practice is that in a Secret Service case the names are not disclosed even to the Minister most immediately concerned. We have no reason to suppose that Indian Ministers will not adopt the same convention, but the difficulty arises not because Indian Ministers are likely to demand or disclose the names of informants or agents, but because the informants or agents themselves would not feel secure that their identity might not be revealed. So long as this doubt exists, the consequences are the same, whether it is ill-founded or not. We, therefore, recommend that the Instrument of Instructions of the Governors should specifically require them to give directions that no records relating to intelligence affecting terrorism should be disclosed to anyone other than such persons within the provincial Police Force as the Inspector General may direct, or such other public officers outside that Force as the Governor may direct. We further recommend that the Constitution Act should contain provisions giving legal sanction for directions to this effect in the Instrument of Instructions.)

Secret Intelligence - reports

It is moved by the Lord Rankeillour As an amendment to the above amendment, to insert at the end of paragraph 89 —

(Lastly we think that the Governor-General should be instructed to inform the Provincial Governors of any Rules which in his opinion should not be cancelled or altered without his consent.)

Paragraph 92 is again read.

It is moved by the Marquess of Louthgow Pages 43 and 44 to leave out paragraph 92 and to insert the following new paragraph —

Special powers
required for combating terrorism.

(92. But, even so the circumstances set out above render it imperative to arm the Governor with powers which will ensure that the measures taken to deal with terrorism and other activities of revolutionary conspirators are not less efficient and unhesitating than they have been in the past. We are, indeed particularly anxious not to absolve Indian Ministers, in Bengal or elsewhere, from the responsibility for combating terrorism and we think that such executive duty should be clearly laid upon them. But the issues at stake are so important, and the consequences of inaction or even of half hearted action, for even a short period of time may be so disastrous, that the Governor of any Province must, in our opinion have a special power over and above his special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to peace and tranquillity to take into his own hands the discharge of this duty even from the outset of the new Constitution. This purpose would not be adequately served by placing the Special Branch of the Provincial Police alone in the personal charge of the Governor. That course has been urged upon us, but we are convinced that it falls short of what is required. Instead we recommend that the Constitution Act should specifically empower the Governor at his discretion, if he regards the peace and tranquillity of the Province as endangered by the activities, overt or secret, of persons committing or conspiring to commit crimes of violence intended to overthrow the Government by law established and if he considers that the situation cannot otherwise be effectively handled to assume charge to such extent as he may judge requisite of any branch of the government which he thinks it necessary to employ to combat such activities, or if necessary to create new machinery for the purpose. If the Governor exercises this power he should be further authorised at his discretion to appoint an official as a temporary member of the Legislature, to act as his mouthpiece in that body and any official so appointed should have the same powers and rights, other than the right to vote as an elected member. The powers which we have just described would be discretionary powers and the Governor would therefore be subject to the superintendence and control of the Governor General and ultimately of the Secretary of State in all matters connected with them. We should add that if conditions in Bengal at the time of the inauguration of Provincial Autonomy have not materially improved, it would, in our judgment, be essential that the Governor of that Province should exercise the powers we have just described forthwith and should be directed to do so in his Instrument of Instructions, which, in this as in other respects, would remain in force until amended with the consent of Parliament¹)

New paragraph 92 is again read

The further consideration of paragraph 92 is postponed

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow After new paragraph 92 to insert the following new paragraph —

("92A We have only to add that we have considered in this connexion a proposal made to us that the Intelligence Departments—or at all events the Special Branch where such exists—of the provincial Police Forces should be placed under the control of the Governor-General, who should utilise them, through the agency of the Governor, as local offshoots of the Central Intelligence Bureau. We agree with the ideas underlying this proposal to this extent, that it is essential that the close touch which has hitherto obtained between the Intelligence Departments of the Provinces and the Central Intelligence Bureau should continue. But to place the provincial Intelligence Departments under the departmental control of the Central Intelligence Bureau would, we think, be undesirable, as tending to break up the organic unity of the provincial Police Force. We recommend, therefore, that the Central Bureau should, under the new Constitution, be assigned to one of the Governor-General's Reserved Departments as part of its normal activities, and that the change in the form of government, whether at the Centre or in the Provinces, should not involve any change in the relationship which at present exists between the Central Bureau and the provincial Intelligence Departments. Should the Governor General find that the information at his disposal whether received through the channel of the Governors or from the provincial Intelligence Departments through the Central Intelligence Bureau is inadequate, he will in virtue of recommendations which we make later¹ possess complete authority to secure through the Governor the correction of any deficiencies, and indeed to point out to the Governor and require him to set right any shortcomings which he may have noticed in the organisation or activities of the provincial Intelligence Branch.'))

Paragraph 347 is read.

It is moved by the Lord Snell Mr Attlee Mr Cocks, and Mr Morgan Jones. Pages 190 and 191 to leave out paragraph 347 and to insert the following new paragraph —

(347 We are impressed with the insistence with which Indians of all sorts of opinion ask that a statement of their fundamental rights should find a place in the new Constitution Act. The Report of the Indian All Parties Conference also made a strong point of this. The authors of the White Paper see serious objections to giving statutory expression to a declaration of this character and suggest that in connection with the inauguration of the new Constitution a pronouncement on the matter might be made by the Sovereign. We cannot forget that such a pronouncement was made by her late Majesty Queen Victoria in these words

We declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure that none be in any wise favoured, none elected, or disqualified by reason of their religious faith or observances, but that all shall alike enjoy the equal and impartial protection of the law and we do strictly charge and enjoin all those who may be in authority under us that they abstain from all interference with the religious belief or worship of any of our subjects on pain of our highest displeasure.

And it is our further will that, so far as may be our subjects, of whatever race or creed be freely and impartially admitted to office in our service the duties of which they may be qualified by their education ability and integrity to discharge.

We know and respect the feelings of attachment with which the natives of India regard the lands inherited by them from their ancestors and we desire to protect them in all rights connected therewith subject to the equitable demands of the State and we will see that generally in framing and administering the law due regard be paid to the ancient rights, usages and customs, of India.

We cannot pretend to believe that full effect has been given in the terms of that Royal Proclamation in India. In view of the fact that it has been impressed on the Indian delegates that no pledges or declarations are binding save such as are embodied in Acts of Parliament we think the Indian plea is sound that whenever possible their fundamental rights should be embodied in the Constitution Act and so be secured to them beyond the possibility of doubt. A proposed list of these 'fundamental rights' is given in Chapter 7 of the Indian All Parties Conference. In reference to these they say —

Our first care should be to have our fundamental rights guaranteed

in a manner which will not admit their withdrawal under any circumstances. With perhaps less reason than we have, most of the modern constitutions of Europe have specific provisions to secure such rights to the people.

They go on very pertinently to say that —

It is moved by Mr Butler and Sir Samuel Hoare. Page 191 after paragraph 349 to insert the following new paragraph —

(349A. But there is another form of private property—perhaps more accurately described as vested interest—common in India which we think requires more specific protection. We refer to grants of land or of tenure of land free of land revenue or subject to partial remissions of land revenue, held under various names (of which Taluk Inam, Watan Jagir and Muafi are examples) throughout British India by various individuals or classes of individuals. Some of these grants date from Moghul or Sikh times and have been confirmed by the British Government others have been granted by the British Government for services rendered. Many of the older grants are enjoyed by religious bodies and are held in the names of the managers for the time being. The terms of these grants differ older grants are mostly perpetual, modern grants are mostly for three or even two generations. But, whatever their terms a grant of this kind is always held in virtue of a specific undertaking given by or on the authority of the British Government that, subject in some cases to the due observance by the grantee of specified conditions, the rights of himself and his successors will be respected either for all time or, as the case may be, for the duration of the grant. A well-known instance of such rights is to be found in those enjoyed by the present Talukdars of Oudh, who owe their origin to the grant to their predecessors in 1853 after the Oudh Rebellion and the consequent confiscation of talukdari rights previously claimed in Oudh, of sanads of Lord Canning the then Governor General, conferring proprietary rights upon all those who engaged to pay the jumma which might then or might from time to time subsequently be fixed subject to loyalty and good behaviour and the rights thus conferred were declared to be permanent, hereditary and transferable.)

The same is agreed to.

New paragraph 349A is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 349A is postponed.

It is moved by Mr Butler and Sir Samuel Hoare. Page 191 After paragraph 349A to insert the following new paragraphs — (349B It is not unnatural that the holders of privileges such as we have described should be apprehensive lest the grant of responsible government, and the consequent handing over to the control of Ministers and Legislatures of all matters connected with land revenue administration should result in a failure to observe the promises which have been extended by Governments in the past to themselves or their predecessors so interest. Some of the claims to protection which have been urged upon us in this connexion would be satisfied, by little less than a statutory declaration which would have the effect of maintaining unaltered and unalterable for all time, however strong the justification for its modification might prove to be in the light of changed circumstances, every promise or undertaking of the kind made by the British Government in the past. We could not contemplate so far reaching a limitation upon the natural consequences of the change to responsible government. We recommend however that the Constitution Act should contain an appropriate provision requiring the prior consent of the Governor General or the Governor as the case may be, to any proposal legislative or executive which would alter or prejudice the rights of the possessor of any privilege of the kind to which we have referred.

Special case of grants of land or of tenure of land free of land revenue

Prior consent of Governor General or Governor should be required to legislation affecting such grants

349C We have considered whether similar provision should be made to protect the rights of Zamindars and others who are the successors in interest of those in whose favour the Permanent Settlement of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa and parts of the United Provinces and Madras was made at the end of the 18th century. Briefly, the effect of this Settlement was to give a proprietary right in land to the class described as Zamindars, on the understanding that they collected and paid to Government the revenue assessed on that land which was fixed at rates declared at the time to be intended to stand unaltered in perpetuity. It is apparent that the position of Zamindars under the Permanent Settlement is very different from that of the individual holders of grants or privileges of the kind we have just described, for, while the privileges of the latter might, but for a protection such as we suggest, be swept away by a stroke of the pen with little or no injury to any but the holder of the vested interest himself, the alteration of the character of land revenue settlement in Bengal, for instance, would involve directly or indirectly the interests of vast numbers of the population in addition to those of the comparatively small number of Zamindars proper, and might indeed produce an economic revolution of a most far-reaching character. Consequently, no Ministry or Legislature in Bengal could, in fact, embark upon, or at all events carry to a conclusion, legislative proposals which would have such results unless they had behind them an overwhelming volume of public support. Moreover, while we do not dispute the fact that the Permanent Settlement is an arrangement which is binding upon the British Government as one of the parties to it, we could not regard this fact as involving the conclusion that it must be placed beyond the legal competence of an Indian Ministry responsible to an Indian Legislature which is to be charged inter alia with the duty of regulating the land revenue system of the Province to alter the enactments embodying the Permanent Settlement, which enactments, despite the promises of permanence they contain, are legally subject (like any other Indian enactment) to repeal or alteration. At the same time, we feel that the Permanent Settlement is not a matter for which, as the result of the introduction of Provincial Autonomy, His Majesty's Government can properly disclaim all responsibility, and we think that the Governor should be enabled on their behalf to intervene at the earliest stage if proposals are made for the modification of the Settlement which, in his opinion, would be prejudicial to any of the interests involved. We recommend, therefore, that in this case also the Constitution Act should require that the previous sanction of the Governor given in his discretion should be the condition precedent to the introduction of any Bill which would alter the character of the Permanent Settlement.

“349D In concluding this chapter of our Report, we take the opportunity of mentioning a topic which can conveniently be dealt with here, though it has no very direct connexion with the question of discrimination or of fundamental rights. It has been urged on us that provision should be made requiring the English language to be the official language of the Federation, or, more particularly, that English should receive legal status as the official language of the Constitution and of the superior Courts, and as one of the official languages of the Provincial Governments. In our judgment, no useful purpose would be served by a general declaration in the sense just indicated, and any such declaration would at once give rise to questions of great difficulty and complexity in relation to education. Our recommendations set out in this chapter include language amongst the grounds upon which, in certain cases, discrimination is to be inadmissible, and these recommendations will accordingly prevent any individual who falls within the scope of the protection of these provisions from being discriminated against on the ground that his mother tongue is English. Apart from this, we recommend that the Letters Patent issued to the High Courts should prescribe English as the language of these Courts, and we think that the constitution Act might well provide, as do the Statutory Rules made under the existing Government of India Act at the present moment, that the business of all the Legislatures is to be conducted in English subject to appropriate provision ensuring the right of any member unacquainted with English to address the Council in the vernacular. At the present moment the language of the Subordinate Courts is laid down by each provincial Government under provisions in the Codes of Civil and Criminal Procedure. We see no reason to suppose that the Provincial Governments will cease to exercise this power under the new Constitution or that they will exercise it in an unreasonable manner.)

Whilst however we are unable to recommend at the moment the specific grant of Constituent Powers we consider that the new Constitution must have within itself provisions whereby developments may take place. We would point out that in our own country constitutional development has taken place not so much by specific enactments as by usage, custom and the falling into desuetude of certain rights. We consider therefore, that the instrument of instructions to the Governor General and the Provincial Governors should be so drafted as to allow of such modifications and developments taking place and further that a variation from time to time of the instrument of instructions will provide the means of a steady transfer of responsibility to Ministers and the elected representatives of the Indian people. ("366 The White Paper proposes, in paragraph 32, that a Reserve Bank, 'free from political influence, will have been set up by Indian legislation,' before the first Federal Ministry comes into being. If it should be proved impossible successfully to start the Reserve Bank, His Majesty's Government 'are pledged to call into conference representatives of Indian opinion.' We note that neither at the first nor at the second Round Table Conference was the establishment of the Reserve Bank treated as a condition precedent to the inauguration of the Federation. It was an entirely new proposal brought forward at the third Round Table Conference. We understand that the Indian Legislature has already passed a Reserve Bank of India Act, and we venture to hope that the date of its inauguration may be speedily decided, since we understand that the beginning of the Indian Federation depends upon it. Assuming the establishment of the Bank, we suggest that the Governor and Deputy Governor should be selected by the Governor-General in consultation with his Ministers

"We are not in agreement with the underlying conception of the establishment of the Reserve Bank, namely, that it should be entirely free from political influence

We consider that decision of policy in respect of credit and currency are vital interests of the community. They should not be made by shareholders whose private interests may not coincide with the welfare of the State but should be influenced by the Government.

In any event it should be made clear that India's currency and credit policy will be decided in accordance with her own needs and not by the influence of external financial interests or foreign creditors.)

If we correctly understand this request to mean that the officers in question desire that though no longer subordinate in any degree to the Governor General of India in Council they should still be entitled to describe themselves as members of the Indian Civil Service, to which they were in fact recruited we see no objection to acceding to their desire.)

The same is agreed to.

Paragraph 439 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 439 is postponed.

Paragraph 139 is again read

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Page 212, lines 3-5, to leave out from ("it") in line 3 to ("enjoy") in line 5 and to insert ("includes certain appointments the incumbents of which")

Paragraphs 141 to 144 are again read and postponed

Paragraph 145 is again read

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 211, line 7, at the end to insert ("But the separation of Burma from India will create a special category of persons in Burma of United Kingdom domicile for whose protection in India provision will, we think, require to be made in the Constitution Act for India rather than that for Burma. We refer to the case of Companies established already in Burma with United Kingdom personnel and United Kingdom capital. Such Companies have established themselves in Burma as a Province of British India and we think that it would evidently be inequitable if, after the separation of Burma, they are in a less favourable position in respect of their operations in British India than a Company established at the same time and under the same conditions in, say, Bombay or Bengal")

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 145 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 145 is postponed

Paragraphs 146 to 149 are again read and postponed

Paragraph 150 is again read

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Page 246, line 8, after ("Burma") to insert ("But as Burma after separation will be a unitary State and will not be within the jurisdiction of the Indian Federal Court, we think that an appeal should lie as of right to the Privy Council from the High Court in any case involving the interpretation of the Constitution Act. We take this opportunity to record our opinion that the recommendations which we have made elsewhere for the prescription of English for the conduct of business in the Indian Legislatures should apply equally to the case of the High Court and the Legislature in Burma. As regards audit arrangements, it is evident that Burma will require after separation her own audit system")

The same is agreed to

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 246, line 14, at the end to insert ("We think that liberty should be afforded in the Act for the new Burma Government to establish a High Commissioner of its own in London if it finds it necessary to do so; but we foresee the possibility that the amount of business requiring to be transacted in London on behalf of the Government of Burma may be so small as not to justify, at the outset, the expense of establishing such an office and we think that it might be well to examine the possibility of the functions of such an official being 'undertaken by some other authority on an agency basis for the time being')

The same is agreed to.

Paragraph 450 is again read, as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 450 is postponed.

Paragraph 451 is again read.

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 246, line 20 after ('Burma.) to insert (It follows that there should be a transference of the rights, liabilities and obligations incurred by the Secretary of State in Council in respect of Burma to the appropriate authority to be established in Burma, corresponding to the transference to the Federal or Provincial Governments in India which in an earlier passage we have suggested should be provided for in the Indian Constitution.')

The same is agreed to.

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Page 246, line 20, after ('person.) to insert (There is, we are convinced no real danger that the interests of Burma would be unfairly subordinated to those of India in the hands of a Secretary of State holding the double office.)

The same is agreed to.

Paragraph 451 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 451 is postponed.

Paragraph 452 is again read.

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Page 246 line 33, to leave out (on service matters) and to insert (on questions concerning Burma)

The amendment, by leave of the Committee, is withdrawn

Paragraph 116 is again read

The further consideration of paragraph 116 is postponed

Paragraphs 117 to 120 are again postponed

Paragraph 121 is again read, as amended, and is as follows —

121 The Communal Award was criticised by more than one witness who appeared before us on the ground that it operates inequitably in the case of Bengal, and even more inequitably with the modifications resulting from the Poona Pact There was also criticism of the Award from other Provinces in which the Hindus are in a minority, but elsewhere the Award appears to have met with acceptance, and we entertain no doubt that if any attempt were now made to alter or modify it, the consequences would be disastrous The arrangement which it embodies appears to us to be well thought out and balanced, and to disturb any part of it would be to run the risk of upsetting the whole It accepts indeed the principle of separate electorates for the Muhammadan, Sikh, Indian Christian, Anglo-Indian, and European communities, but we recognize that this is an essential and inevitable condition of any new constitutional scheme We may deplore the mutual distrust of which the insistence on this demand by the minorities is so ominous a symptom, but it is unhappily a factor in the situation which cannot be left out of account, nor do we think that we can usefully add anything to what we have already said on the subject We accept therefore the proposals in the White Paper for the composition of the Legislative Assemblies We feel somewhat differently, however, about the Poona Pact We consider that the original proposals of His Majesty's Government constitute a more equitable settlement of the general communal question and one which is more advantageous to the Depressed Classes themselves in their present stage of development They united the two sections of the Hindu Community by making them vote together in the general constituencies, thereby compelling candidates to consider the well-being of both sections of his constituents when appealing for their support, while they secured to the Depressed Classes themselves sufficient spokesmen in the legislature, elected wholly by depressed class votes, to ensure their case being heard and to influence voting, but not so numerous that the Depressed Classes will probably be unable to find representatives of adequate calibre with results unfortunate both to themselves and the legislatures. That solution was altered in a great hurry under pressure of Mr Gandhi's fast unto death. In view of the fact that His Majesty's Government felt satisfied that the agreement come to at Poona fell within the terms of their original announcement and accepted it as a valid modification of the communal award, we do not feel able to recommend them now to reject it. But subsequently to the arrangement of the fact objections to it in relation to Bengal, have been strongly urged by caste Hindus from that Province. We should welcome an agreement between the caste Hindus and Depressed Classes to reduce the number of seats reserved to the latter in Bengal, possibly with some compensatory increase in such seats in some other Provinces where a small addition in favour of the Depressed Classes would not be likely materially to affect the balance of communities in the Legislature.

The White Paper proposals accepted

It is moved by the Marquess of Reading the Lord Ker (M. Lothian) Mr Foot, Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Lines 19 and 20 to leave out from (Assemblies) in line 19 to (consider') in line 20 and to insert (As regards the Poona Pact we are bound to say that we)

The same is agreed to

It is moved by the Marquess of Reading, the Lord Ker (M. Lothian) Mr Foot, Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Line 21 to leave out (constitut) and to insert (constituted)

The same is agreed to

It is moved by the Marquess of Reading the Lord Ker (M. Lothian) Mr Foot, Sir Samuel Hoare, and Mr Butler Line 23 to leave out (is) and to insert (was)

The same is agreed to

It is moved by the Marquess of Reading the Lord Ker (M. Lothian) Mr Foot, Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Line 31 to leave out ('will probably) and to insert (would)

The same is agreed to

It is moved by the Marquess of Reading the Lord Ker (M. Lothian) Mr Foot, Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Lines 39 to 43 to leave out from (calibre) in line 39 to (where) in line 43 and to insert ('Under the pressure of Mr Gandhi's fast these proposals were precipitately modified but in view of the fact that His Majesty's Government felt satisfied that the agreement come to at Poona fell within the terms of their original announcement and accepted it as an authoritative modification of the Communal Award, we are clear that it cannot now be rejected. Nevertheless, as we have said objections to the Pact in relation to Bengal have since been strongly urged by caste Hindus from that Province and if by agreement between the communities concerned some reduction were made in the number of seats reserved to the Depressed Classes in Bengal possibly with compensatory increase in the number of their seats in other Provinces)

The same is agreed to

It is moved by the Marquess of Reading the Lord Ker (M. Lothian) Mr Foot Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Line 45 to end to insert (we are disposed to think that the working of the new Constitution in Bengal would be facilitated)

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 121 is again read, as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 121 is postponed.

Paragraphs 122 to 131 are again postponed

Paragraph 133 is again read

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Page 63, lines 14 to 18 to leave out from (and) in line 14 to (the') in line 18, and to insert (we have reason to believe that there is for example even now a large body of opinion in India which would condone')

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 132 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 132 is postponed

Paragraph 133 is again postponed

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Page 68, line 10, at the end to insert ("or (2) which affects religion or religious rites and usages")

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 138 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 138 is postponed

Paragraph 139 is again read

Page 68, lines 11 to 19, to leave out from the beginning of the paragraph to ("We") in line 19 and to insert ("We do not think that the consent of the Governor should any longer be required to the introduction of legislation which affects religion or religious rites and usages We take this view, not because we think that the necessity for such consent might prejudice attempts to promote valuable social reforms, which has been suggested as a reason for dispensing with it, but because in our judgment legislation of this kind is above all other such as ought to be introduced on the responsibility of Indian Ministers We have given our reasons elsewhere for holding that matters of social reform which may touch, directly or indirectly, Indian religious beliefs can only be undertaken with any prospect of success by Indian Ministers themselves, and, that being so, we think it undesirable that then responsibility in this most important field should be shared with a Governor It has been objected that the mere introduction of legislation affecting religion or religious rites and usages might be dangerous at times of religious or communal disturbance, and might indeed itself produce such disturbance We observe, however, a Proposal in the White Paper¹ whereby the Governor would be empowered, in any case in which he considers that a Bill introduced or proposed for introduction, or any clause thereof, or any amendment to a Bill moved or proposed, would affect the discharge of his special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of the Province, to direct that the Bill, clause or amendment shall not be further proceeded with This appears to us an ample safeguard against the danger to which we have referred, and in addition it would of course always be open to the Governor, in his discretion, to refuse his assent to any Bill which has been passed by the Legislature, if in his opinion it is undesirable on any ground that it should become law")

It is moved by the Lord Rankellour As an amendment to the above amendment line 13 of the amendment, after ("Governor") to insert ("It must be remembered that the Governor has the right of veto in respect of all legislation, and in this case it would be open to him, if he thought it right, to exercise this power in protection of the interests of minorities in accordance with his special responsibility")

The amendment, to the amendment, by leave of the Committee, is withdrawn

The original amendment is again moved

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 139 is again read, as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 139 is postponed

Paragraphs 140 to 154 are again postponed

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Page 176 line 47 to leave out (town bred) and to insert after (pleaders') (from the towns)

The same is agreed to.

Paragraph 318 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 318 is postponed

Paragraphs 319 to 453 and 1 to 516 are again postponed.

Paragraph 56 is again read

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock. Page 26 line 40 to page 27 line 11 to leave out from (taken ') in line 40 page 26, to the end of the paragraph on page 27

The same is disagreed to

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock Page 27 after paragraph 56 to insert the following new paragraph —

(56A. The separation of Sind from Bombay is an old controversy but its constitution as a separate Governor's Province is a problem which has arisen out of the constitutional reform and has now become a focus of communal strife. Long before its creation into a separate Province came into prominence, the question whether it should be detached from Bombay and attached to the Punjab was at one time a serious issue. The Bombay Government was opposed to this step but in the event of its separation demanded territorial compensation which would have dismembered other Provinces and on account of their opposition the matter was dropped. The construction of the Sukkur Barrage while bringing the creation of Sind into a separate Province into greater prominence, necessarily revives the issue as to whether a better alternative might not be found by its amalgamation with the Punjab. For the adoption of this latter alternative there are two important reasons. First because this amalgamation would bring the Indus River within the confines and under the jurisdiction of a single Province and a single staff of engineering experts instead of leaving the utilization of the Upper Indus under one Government and the area commanded by the Sukkur system under another. This would provoke acute controversy between the two Provinces and between the interests of the upper riparian people in the Punjab and the lower riparian people in Sind. Once this question of the Indus supply was put under the control of a single administration, then the interests of both sets of people would weigh equally with the single Government responsible for both alike. Also incidentally the cost of the supervising staff might be considerably cheapened. The second reason is that the Punjab would be equally interested with Sind in the rapid colonisation of the large areas which are awaiting colonists and irrigation. We are informed that Sikh farmers of good class have already been attracted to the new areas in Sind. The last census of 1931, shows that there are now 18,000 Sikhs in Sind, and the influx of sturdy farmers of this description would be a very helpful asset to the progress of that territory. This aspect of the Sind question has been strongly advanced by Sir Henry Lawrence, who has served for 18 years in that Province and was Commissioner in Sind before he became an Executive Councillor of the Bombay Government. We regard it as an alternative proposal deserving the attention of the several Governments concerned before a final decision has been made in favour of the creation of a Sind Province. It has the further advantage that the railway connection between the Punjab and Karachi is more developed than that between Sind and Bombay, and it would give the Punjab a port of its own at Karachi. It would also ease the feeling amongst Hindus in a separated Sind of hopeless numerical inferiority to the Moslems. There can be no doubt about the genuineness of Hindu anxiety at finding themselves as they would describe it, at the mercy of a large fanatical Moslem population. Under impartial British rule they have, by superior education and wealth, obtained a prominence in public affairs which would not otherwise have been possible, and they fear that under the new Constitution, especially if Law and Order be transferred, they will become victims of Moslem lawlessness and will steadily be ousted from their present position. These risks are by no means imaginary, for while in the towns they may be sufficiently numerous to protect themselves, it is otherwise in the villages, and even in the past the scattered Hindus in the rural areas have been the victims of dacoities, kidnapping and murder. In Bombay including Sind the ratio of Hindus to Moslems is nearly 4 to 1, in a separated Sind the ratio drops to but a little over 1 to 4. Hitherto, on the existing franchise, Hindus being wealthier, have had higher voting strength than their numerical proportion. With the lowering of the franchise they fear that Moslems will gain the ascendancy. There are only 230,000 persons who are literate in Sind, of whom the greater proportion consists of Hindus. It is believed everywhere that the decision to create the new Sind Province was a concession to Moslem sentiment, and Moslems in other Provinces have espoused the cause of their Sind brethren by means of a division of territory which would secure them a large permanent majority over the Hindu. It is in our judgment open to much doubt whether we should be justified in making territorial adjustments which have the effect of turning a large majority into a small minority, and on this ground, alone we think that the creation of Sind into a separate Province is inexpedient and likely to provoke violence and even bloodshed, which might have grave repercussions in many other parts of India. Apart, however, from these considerations, we regard the financial prospects as definitely unfavourable to the creation of Sind as a new Province at the present time. This argument was stressed by the Statutory Commission. Several estimates have been framed at different times of the probable deficit in the finances of a separated Sind, the extra expenditure entailed by the reformed Constitution there, and the probable duration of the period before Sind may be expected to pay its way. The development of irrigation under the Barage in the first two or three years since it has been completed does not necessarily prove that its further development will continue with equal rapidity. Account must be taken of the reduced credit of the rural population under the effect of the calamitous fall in prices of agricultural produce, and even if the overhead charges of making Sind a Governor's Province are kept within the narrowest limits the fact remains that the taxpayers of India generally have to bear additional burdens in order to gratify Moslem pride. Financial considerations, therefore, strongly indicate the advisability of postponing this change until the actual results of the Barrage, rather than estimates made now which may prove too optimistic, have rendered it certain that Sind has become self-supporting. The fact that the Sukkur Barrage is proposed by the White Paper to constitute a special responsibility of the Governor though valuable in securing in some measure the impartial administration of the colonisation rules or the appointment of suitable experts has little bearing on the rapidity with which the land is taken up for no Governor is able by the exercise of his authority to secure the influx of new colonists if the supply of such falls short of the capacity of the land. For all these reasons the better course appears to us that Sind should continue as a sub-Province included in Bombay at least for ten years, during which time the advisability of attaching it to the Panjab can be thoroughly examined and the financial future of Sind, if constituted a new Province, can be ascertained with reasonable accuracy.)

Paragraph 58 is again read.

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock. Page 23, to leave out paragraph 58 and to insert the following new paragraph:—

{ 23. The problem of Orissa differs from that of Sind. Long before the people of Orissa thought of themselves as a separate Province their anxiety was concentrated on the inclusion into Orissa of adjacent Oriya speaking areas from the Madras Presidency and the Oriya States under the political administration of the Central Provinces, in addition to the Sambalpar District which is divided from the rest of Orissa by a number of these States. The changes then effected were part of the Partition of Bengal, whereby Bengal proper was bereft of Eastern Bengal and thus consisted of Western Bengal, Bihar, Chota Nagpur and Orissa. In exchange for the Oriya-speaking States, Bengal gave to the Central Provinces five Hindi-speaking States. Upon the revocation of the Partition at the end of 1911, Bengal received back the Eastern Bengal Provinces and the non-Bengali-speaking territories of Bihar and Chota Nagpur, to which also was added Orissa, were made the new Province of Bihar and Orissa. No attempt was made, however, to separate the Oriya-speaking part of Ganjam from the Madras Presidency in order to include it in Orissa proper. This has really been the standing grievance of Orissa, and it can be rectified by the addition of this territory whether Orissa is made into a separate Province or not. We consider that this grievance should be met by revision of the boundary between Orissa and the Madras Presidency, but the question of constituting a separate Province of Orissa by itself is an entirely separate one. Orissa, even with the territory now proposed to be added, is nothing but a Commissioner's Division in area and population, as well as in importance. The decision to take away the Oriya-speaking and the adjacent Hindi-speaking States of the C. P. from the Governments now responsible for them and placing them under the Central Government has greatly reduced the charge which the Commissioner of Orissa has hitherto had in his keeping. The Sambalpur District and the Khariar Zamindari, (which is now to be added to Orissa), are no longer so convenient a portion of that Province now that the States have been transferred to the control of the Governor-General. Orissa is for the most part backward, it contains a large number of aboriginal tribes and it has not really the making of a full-fledged Governor's Province. It had much better be treated, if it is to be separated, as a Chief Commissioner's Province, in which case it might be allowed the privilege of a small Legislature, similar to that granted to the small Province of Coorg, but the better alternative in our opinion would be to leave it for ten years as a part of Bihar and Orissa, and during that period to examine at leisure whether it might not be more appropriately restored to Bengal. Financially, it is likely to be a deficit Province for an unknown period of time, and the extent of the deficit will be increased by the overhead charges of constituting it a separate Governor's Province. In addition to the reasons which we have mentioned, the constitution of this small linguistic Province will create a most inconvenient precedent, for next door to it is a large Telugu-speaking area. There are said to be six million people only in Orissa, of whom only about five million are Oriya-speaking, but the Telugu area, which has already been given the name of the Andhra Province, contains no less than eighteen million Telugu speakers who are anxious to separate themselves from the Tamils of Madras. There are no more reasons for keeping the Oriyas outside Bengal than there are for refusing a similar claim made by the Telugu speakers of the Madras Presidency. Further than that, any movement towards creating linguistic areas, if encouraged now, would lead to linguistic claims which would entail the dismemberment of various Provinces. It would have the further very serious effect of running counter to the unity of India as a whole, for if different languages cannot compose their differences within the limits of a single Province, it can scarcely be expected of the infinitely greater number of linguistic divisions over India as a whole to compose their much greater differences in a joint Central Government. In other words, the distribution of India by linguistic Provinces would increase greatly those centrifugal tendencies which militate against the success of the whole Federal Scheme. Lastly, whatever may have been the motives of those who framed the constitution of the White Paper, the whole of India considers that the proposal to create a new Province of Sind is intended to placate Moslem sentiment and similarly the creation of a new Province of Orissa is intended as a counterpoise to gratify Hindu sentiment. It is in our opinion undesirable that the creation of small areas into new Provinces should be effected with any other consideration than the intrinsic merits of changes that are so expansive and place a burden on the whole of the tax payers of India for the sake of only ten million out of a total population (excluding Burma) of 338 million)

Under the Code of Criminal Procedure a condemned prisoner whose petition has been rejected by the Local Government, can petition the Governor-General in Council, and under the procedure laid down in the rules of business the member in charge of the Home Department of the Government of India deals with the case and can reject such a petition without reference to the Viceroy but if the Home Member wishes to commute a death sentence he must refer the case to the Viceroy. It is open to the Viceroy then either to concur with the Home Member or to consult the Law Member before passing his own orders, or to circulate the case to the Council but Constitutionally the Viceroy as Governor General cannot overrule the majority of the Council, if in disagreement with him. Since 1918, however the Royal Prerogative of mercy has been definitely delegated to the Viceroy himself, thereby conferring upon him the power of overruling the Council in the matter of commuting a death sentence. Under the proposed New Constitution the Minister in charge of the Home Department will presumably exercise the same right of advising the Governor General as to the commutation or otherwise of a death sentence and the question arises whether the exercise of the Royal Prerogative by the Governor General in his capacity of Viceroy will override the Constitutional power of the Minister in the direction of enabling the Viceroy to refuse to commute the death sentence which the Minister advises should be commuted. We consider that the ultimate decision whether to exercise this prerogative or to let the law take its course should rest with the Viceroy alone)

("202A We feel strongly, however, that it is not possible for Parliament to lay down to-day the exact method of constituting the central legislature for any long period of time. The question has been repeatedly examined both before the passage of the present Government of India Act by the Statutory Commission and by the Round Table Conferences and the Indian Franchise Committee in connection with the present proposals for reform. Throughout this whole period opinions have been deeply divided and no clear cut solution has emerged, as indeed was to be expected when an attempt is being made to create a federation on a scale and of a character hitherto without precedent. We have chosen the system of indirect election by the provincial legislatures, not because we do not feel the force of the arguments which can be brought against it, but because we think that it is the arrangement which will give the most practical system at the outset of the Federation. Moreover, while it will be possible in future to pass from the indirect to the direct system of election should experience show that step to be advisable, the maintenance and still more the extension of the system of direct election to-day would be to commit India to a system which logically leads to adult suffrage before any way has been discovered of overcoming the insuperable objections to the gigantic constituencies containing hundreds of thousands of voters which are inevitable with adult franchise in India under the ordinary system of direct election. We feel that the ultimate solution may well be found in some variant either of the system whereby groups of primary voters elect secondary electors who vote directly for members of the federal assembly or of the system whereby those already elected to local bodies, such as village panchayats, are the voters who vote directly for members of that assembly. Systems of this kind apparently work with considerable success in many countries where conditions are not dissimilar to those in India. But the discovery of the best method of adapting those ideas to India's needs and of removing the obstacles which now stand in the way of their adoption is clearly one which should be made by Indians themselves in the light of their experience of the practical working of representative institutions under the new Constitution. We consider, therefore, that our proposals should be regarded as being in the nature of an experiment and that further consideration should be given to the question of the method of composing the central legislature in the light of practical working of the constitution. We do not propose that there should be any formal examination of the problem by a statutory Commission after any specific date, for we think that experience has shown that there are strong objections to automatic provisions of this kind. But we consider that Parliament should recognise that after sufficient time has elapsed to enable clear judgments to be formed of the way in which the constitution works and of the new political forces it has brought into being, it may be necessary to make amendments in the method of composing the central legislature, and we hope that if Indian opinion thinks modification is required ("326 The importance attached in this country to this part of the Indian Constitutional problem has been very much misunderstood in India. We believe our first duty is to define the problem with which we are dealing in such a way as to remove the grounds for much, if not all, of the misunderstanding

Reasons why statutory provision is necessary

"The Second Round Table Conference in 1931 adopted a resolution to the effect that there should be no discrimination between the rights of the British mercantile community, firms and companies, trading in India, and the rights of Indian born subjects, witnesses who appeared before us spoke in the same sense, and the British-Indian Delegation in their Joint Memorandum state that on the question of principle there has always been a substantial measure of agreement in India. On the other hand, we have been assured no less strongly by those who represent British commercial interests that they ask for no exceptional or preferential treatment of British trade as against Indian trade, and on this aspect of the matter their policy is one of a fair field and no favour. The question therefore resolves itself to a consideration of the best method of giving practical effect to the avowed policy and intentions of all concerned.

It may be asked why in view of this evidence of common agreement, it should be necessary to deal with the matter at all in the Constitution Act. There are, we believe, two very good and powerful reasons for doing so—one of a general juridical character and the other political. The juridical reason arises from the fact that the relations between India and the United Kingdom, after the passing of the Act will be in every way exceptional. There will be no background of common usage or international law such as exists between two foreign countries and by mutual consent influences both parties in their dealing with one another apart from any treaty engagements they may have exchanged.

The second reason is political in the sense that it arises from the necessity of coping with deep-seated and widely held beliefs which must be satisfied if the reforms as a whole are to succeed. In India it has been freely suggested that H. M. Government are seeking to impose unreasonable fetters upon the future Indian legislature for the purpose of securing exceptional advantage to British at the expense of Indian commerce. The suggestion is without foundation and can only be countered by clear proposals which will show how false it is. On the other hand there have been statements of a very disturbing character made from time to time by influential persons in India which could not fail to give rise to suspicions and doubts in this country thus making statutory provision by way of reassurance an evident necessity without at all implying a belief on our part that it really is the accepted policy of any Indian political leaders to destroy or injure British commercial interests by unfair or discriminatory legislation or otherwise.

Administrative Discrimination.

327 Discrimination may be of two kinds, administrative or legislative, and we propose in the first place to consider the administrative form.

We agree with the proposal in the White Paper that the Governor General and Governors in their respective spheres should have imposed upon them a special responsibility for the prevention of discrimination thus enabling them if action is proposed by their Ministers which would have discriminatory effect, to intervene and, if necessary either to decline to accept their advice or (as the case may require) to exercise the special powers which flow from the possession of special responsibility.)

The Fiscal Convention.

328. Before considering the scope which should be given to provisions in restraint of legislative discrimination generally in matters other than tariffs and other regulations directly affecting imports of merchandise we think it is essential to deal quite separately with that particular problem which quite obviously calls for treatment very different from that which is necessary or appropriate in such matters as company law or internal taxation affecting British companies persons or property actually within the frontiers of India at the material time. In the case of tariffs or other regulations affecting imports, the problem is one of policy as well as practice.

We think it right to observe that it is not our intention that any of the provisions which we contemplate for the purpose of preventing discrimination whether administrative or legislative should be so utilised as to interfere with the recommendations made by the Joint Committee on the Bill of 1919 commonly called the Fiscal Convention.

"At the same time, fears have been expressed lest the unrestricted operation of this Convention might result, with no remedy available, in the imposition of penal tariffs upon British goods or the application on British goods of penally restrictive regulations, with the object, not of fostering Indian trade in a manner and to a degree which would be recognised as reasonable but rather and primarily with the object of injuring and excluding British trade possibly in order to put pressure on this country for political purposes, possibly to give expression to extreme political sentiments or for reasons of that general character

"We are satisfied that it was not in the minds of the authors of the Fiscal Convention and has never during the period of its operation been in the mind of His Majesty's Government, that the Convention should be invoked in aid of such a policy, and we have been assured by the Indian Delegates that there would be no desire in India that such freedom as they enjoy under the Convention should be utilised in future for a purpose so destructive of the basis of that conception of partnership upon which the whole of our recommendations proceed. In these circumstances we shall in fact, be making no change in the existing fiscal relations between India and this country if we seek to make plain on the face of the Statute that it is not a legitimate or permissible use of the Fiscal Convention to discriminate against British trade as such. We think it essential that on this matter there should be no ground for misapprehension in future

"It is the more desirable that something of this nature should be done when it is borne in mind that a statutory definition of the position is often of itself sufficient to prevent disputes arising and that, apart from the terms of the Act, the relations between India and the United Kingdom in this particular respect will be nowhere expressly defined or even broadly indicated, as will be the case between India and foreign countries where treaty law and the accepted canons of international law and usage will apply

"We, therefore, recommend that to the special responsibilities of the Governor-General enumerated in the White Paper there should be added a further special responsibility defined in some such terms as follows —

"The prevention in connection with fiscal measures or measures for the control or regulation of import trade, or with the administration of such measures of the subjection of British goods imported into India from the United Kingdom to any form of discriminatory treatment, whether such discrimination should take the form of —

- "(a) discrimination against U K products as compared with imports from other countries directly by means of differential rates of tariff, or indirectly by means of differential treatment of various types of products,
- or (g) discrimination against U K interests as compared with Indian interests by the attempted establishment on goods of U K origin of levels of import duty or other restrictions of a prohibitory or penal character in excess of the equitable requirements of the economic situation in India,
- or (c) discrimination such as would arise by action in violation of any agreement subsisting at the time between the Governments of India and the U K as regards rates of tariff and margins of preference,
- or (d) commercial or trade agreements with countries other than the United Kingdom which would place India under an obligation to treat the goods and merchandise of the U K less favourably than those of another country or other countries,
- or (e) any other action having a discriminatory effect "

The Governor
General's Instrument of Instructions.

329 But in making this recommendation we further recommend that the Governor General should be given clear directions in his Instrument of Instructions as to the scope of the special responsibility in question

The instructions we contemplate would indicate that this special responsibility is not intended to affect the competence of the Indian Legislature and of his Government to develop their own fiscal and economic policy that the duty imposed upon him by this provision is that of preventing imports from the United Kingdom from being subjected to specially unfavourable treatment in respect of such matters as customs duties prohibition or restrictions (other than measures concerned with the preservation of Health) that he should understand that the Federal Government naturally enjoys complete freedom to negotiate with other countries for the securing of mutual tariff concessions and that he has no functions in connection therewith unless and until tariff legislation is proposed which embodies discrimination against U K imports within the limits defined in our recommendations and finally that he should be enjoined that it is his duty under this special responsibility not only to prevent discriminatory action legislative or administrative but also action which though not in form discriminatory is so in fact)

The proposed new paragraphs are by leave of the Committee withdrawn

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Pages 180 and 191 to leave out paragraphs 326 and 327 and to insert the following new paragraphs — definition of problem

(326 The importance attached in this country to this part of the Indian constitutional problem has been much misunderstood in India. We believe that our first duty is to define it in such a way as to remove this misunderstanding. In our view the problem is divisible into two entirely separate issues. The only one of these issues dealt with in the White Paper is the question of administrative and legislative discrimination against British commercial interests and British trade in India. With this issue we deal in detail in later paragraphs.¹

Convention.

327 The other issue which we now proceed to consider is that of discrimination against British imports. As is well known the fiscal relations between the United Kingdom and India have now been regulated for some thirteen years by the recommendations of the Joint Committee on the Bill of 1919—commonly known as the Fiscal Convention. It is a commonplace that the exact scope and effects of this Convention have afforded much ground for discussion and that the Convention has not—as indeed could hardly have been expected—succeeded in placing beyond controversy the rights and duties of the two parties to it. But, with the passing of a new Constitution Act on the lines of the recommendations which we make in this Report, the Convention in its present form at all events will necessarily lapse and unless the Constitution Act otherwise provides the Federal Legislature will enjoy complete fiscal freedom with little in the nature of settled tradition to guide its relationship in fiscal matters with this country. The difficulties which would be likely to arise from this uncertainty would moreover find a fruitful source of increase in that atmosphere of misunderstanding to which we have alluded. It is suggested in India that in seeking to clarify the fiscal relations between India and themselves His Majesty's Government are seeking to impose unreasonable fetters upon the future Indian Legislature for the purpose of securing exceptional advantages for British at the expense of Indian trade. The suggestion is without foundation but can be countered only by clear proposals which will show how false it is. On the other hand statements of a very misleading character have been made from time to time by influential persons in India which have aroused suspicion and doubts in the United Kingdom In these circumstances, appropriate provisions in the Constitution Act may serve the double purpose of facilitating the transition from the old to new conditions, and of reassuring sensitive opinion in both countries Certainly, such provisions would in no way imply a belief that there is real ground for the apprehensions entertained on either side")

The same are agreed to

New paragraphs 326 and 327 are again read

The further consideration of paragraphs 326 and 327 is postponed

Paragraphs 328 to 330 are again read

It is moved by Mr Cocks and Mr Morgan Jones Page 181, line 22, to page 182, line 38, to leave out from the beginning of line 22, page 181, to the end of paragraph 330 on page 182 and to insert —

(" without any interference from Whitehall on any matters on which the Government of India and the Indian Legislature are in agreement— since the inauguration of the present Constitution in 1921

" This followed on the Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament of 17th November, 1919 Paragraph 33 of that Report said inter alia that

' Nothing is more likely to endanger the good relations between India and Great Britain than a belief that India's fiscal policy is dictated from Whitehall in the interests of the trade and commerce of Great Britain That such a belief exists at the moment there can be no doubt That there ought to be no room for it in the future is equally clear

' Whatever be the right fiscal policy for India, for the needs of her consumers as well as for her manufacturers, it is quite clear that she should have the same liberty to consider her interests as Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa '

" His Majesty's Government accepted this recommendation and it was intimated to the Government of India by the Secretary of State on 30th June, 1921 The Statutory Commission in their Report quote the statement made by the Secretary of State in March, 1921, that —

' After the Report by an authoritative Committee of both Houses and Lord Curzon's promise in the House of Lords, it was absolutely impossible for me to interfere with the right which I believe was wisely given and which I am determined to maintain—to give to the Government of India the right to consider the interests of India first just as we, without any complaint from any other parts of the Empire, and the other parts of the Empire, without any complaint from us, have always chosen the tariff arrangements which they think best fitted for their needs, thinking of their own citizens first ¹

" In the course of his evidence before us, Sir Charles Innes, who, before taking up his duties as Governor of Burma, was on the Council of the Governor-General of India as Commerce Member, said in regard to India's attitude to the Ottawa agreements

' I think it was mainly due to the fact that the Indians realized that it was for themselves to decide whether or not they would ratify that agreement In the old days, before we introduced this principle of discriminating protection, every Indian thought that Britain kept India a free-trade country in the interest of her own trade When the Fiscal Convention was introduced and when we passed a Resolution in favour of discriminating protection, and the first Steel Bill was passed, we at once transferred all that from the political sphere to the economic sphere, and in recent years in the Indian Legislative Assembly more and more we have been creating a strong Free Trade Party It was getting more and more difficult for me to pass Protection Bills I think that is all to the good, it shows the value of responsibility, and I am perfectly sure that if we had not taken that action,

you would never have got the Indian to agree to the British preference on steel or to the Ottawa agreement, and it seems to me a very good example of the stimulating effect of responsibility

We realize the importance of giving full weight to this evidence on the value of placing responsibility on the Indian Legislature coming as it does, from one who is in a position to speak with authority

"The Statutory Commission further point out that —

An understanding analogous to the fiscal convention has been arrived at in one other region. The Secretary of State has relinquished his control of policy in the matter of the purchase of Government stores for India, other than military stores. The Governments in India, in agreement with the legislatures, are now free to buy stores in India, in this country or abroad, as seems best to them, and the Secretary of State though he is by statute responsible to Parliament has undertaken not to intervene.

There is much force in Mr Baldwin's words —

All the safeguards are being examined by the Joint Select Committee, but whatever safeguards we have the real safeguard is the maintenance of goodwill. If there is not a basis of goodwill your trade will eventually wither away and I regret to say that some of the measures which have been suggested and which Lancashire people have been asked to support, have in my judgment, been calculated to destroy rather than to further any possibility of that goodwill between Lancashire and India which we can get, which we ought to get and which we cannot do without

The boycott has died away by a conviction in the minds of the Indians themselves that we were going to deal honourably with them and keep our word about getting on with the reforms.¹

The same idea is expressed in the Memorandum submitted to us by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru —

The best safeguard that Lancashire or for the matter of that England can have for trade and commerce in India is the good will of the people of India.²

We think, therefore that the time has now come to recognize in the Constitution Act the right and the responsibility of India to settle her own fiscal affairs as freely as and on a basis of equality with Great Britain and the Dominions.

We agree with the British Indian delegates in their Memorandum submitted to us, that the question of Commercial Discrimination might be left to the commercial interests in India and England who would doubtless be able to evolve a friendly settlement by negotiation. Failing that we agree that it might be provided in the Constitution Act that anything of the nature of discriminatory legislation should require the previous assent of the Governor General given in his discretion. We think that the formula proposed by the Indian Delegates should be adopted namely that the Governor General should not be entitled to refuse his assent unless he is assured that the object of the legislation is, in the words of the Montagu Chelmsford Report not so much to promote Indian commerce as to injure British commerce or as proposed by the Statutory Commission in order to prevent serious prejudice to one or more sections of the community as compared with other sections.)

The said amendment is disagreed to

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Pages 181 and 182 to leave out paragraphs 328 and 329 and to insert the following new paragraphs —

(“ 328 But in making our recommendations to this end, we wish to make it clear at the outset that we contemplate no measure which would interfere with the position attained by India as an integral part of the British Empire, through the Fiscal Convention Fears have, indeed, been expressed lest the exercise of powers by the Indian Legislature which the Convention contemplated might result in the imposition of penal tariffs on British goods or in the application to them of penalty restrictive regulations with the object not of fostering Indian trade, but of injuring and excluding British trade The answer to these fears is that the Convention could never, in fact, have been applied in aid of such a policy, and we have been assured by the Indian Delegates that there will be no desire in India to utilise any powers they may enjoy under the new Constitution for a purpose so destructive of the conception of partnership upon which all our recommendations are based But, if this be so, it would be clearly of great advantage to allay the fears of which we have spoken by a declaration through and under the Constitution Act of the principles governing the relations between the two countries The machinery of the Governor-General’s special responsibilities, supplemented by his Instrument of Instructions, offers India and the United Kingdom the opportunity of making such a declaration of principles, while at the same time ensuring the necessary flexibility in their interpretation and application

The Fiscal Convention and the new Constitution

“ 329 We therefore recommend that to the special responsibilities of the Governor-General enumerated in the White Paper there should be added a further special responsibility defined in some such terms as follows — ‘ The prevention of measures, legislative or administrative, which would subject British goods, imported into India from the United Kingdom, to discriminatory or penal treatment ’ But, as it is important that the scope which we intend to be attached to the special responsibility so defined should be explained more exactly than could conveniently be expressed in statutory language we further recommend that the Governor General's Instrument of Instructions should give him full and clear guidance. It should be made clear that the imposition of this special responsibility upon the Governor-General is not intended to affect the competence of his Government and of the Indian Legislature to develop their own fiscal and economic policy that they will possess complete freedom to negotiate agreements with the United Kingdom or other countries for the securing of mutual tariff concessions and that it will be his duty to intervene in tariff policy or in the negotiation or variation of tariff agreements only if, in his opinion, the intention of the policy contemplated is to subject trade between the United Kingdom and India to restrictions conceived not in the economic interests of India but with the object of injuring the interest of the United Kingdom. It should further be made clear that the discriminatory or penal treatment covered by this special responsibility includes both direct discrimination (whether by means of differential tariff rates or by means of differential restrictions on imports) and indirect discrimination by means of differential treatment of various types of products and that the Governor-General's special responsibility could also be used to prevent the imposition of prohibitory tariffs or restrictions if he were satisfied that such measures were proposed with the intention already described. In all these respects, the words would cover measures which though not discriminatory or penal in form, would be so in fact.

Governor General should have a special responsibility to prevent penal discrimination against British imports.

Principles of future trade relations between India and United Kingdom.

329A. But although the Instrument of Instructions affords the means of defining more fully than would be possible in the Act itself the scope and purpose of the special responsibility which the Act should confer, even this document cannot conveniently be utilised as the means of explaining the broad principles upon which in our view, the future trade relations between India and the United Kingdom should be based. We wish therefore to express our own conception of these principles. We think that the United Kingdom and India must approach their trade problems in a spirit of reciprocity which views the trade between the two countries as a whole. Both countries have a wide range of needs and interests in some of these each country is complementary to the other while in some each has inevitably to look rather to a third country for satisfactory arrangements of mutual advantage. The reciprocity which, as partners they have a right to expect from each other consists in a deliberate effort to expand the whole range of their trade with each other to the fullest possible extent compatible with the interests of their own people. The conception of reciprocity does not preclude either partner from entering into special agreements with third countries for the exchange of particular commodities where such agreements offer it advantages which it cannot obtain from the other but the conception does imply that, when either partner is considering to what extent it can offer special advantages of this kind to a third country without injustice to the other partner it will have regard to the general range of benefits secured to it by the partnership and not merely to the usefulness of the partner ship in relation to the particular commodity under consideration at the moment.

Discrimination against British trade in India

" 329B We turn now to the other issue presented by this section of our Report namely the prevention of discrimination against British trade in India. The Second Round Table Conference in 1931 adopted a resolution to the effect that there should be no discrimination between the rights of the British mercantile community firms and companies trading in India and the rights of Indian born subjects. Witnesses who appeared before us spoke in the same sense and the British Indian Delegation, in their joint memorandum state that on the question of principle there has always been a substantial measure of agreement in India. On the other hand, we have been assured no less strongly by those who represent British commercial interests that they ask for no exceptional or preferential treatment for British trade as against Indian trade. Their policy is, in fact, one of a fair field and no favour. The question therefore, resolves itself into a consideration of the best method of giving practical effect to the avowed policy and intentions of all concerned. It may, indeed, be asked why, in view of the assurances of which we have spoken, it is necessary to deal with this matter at all in the Constitution Act, and to this our answer must be that here again utterances have been made which could not fail to give rise to suspicions and doubts, and that statutory provision by way of re-assurance is an evident necessity.

“329C Discrimination may be of two kinds, administrative or legislative. We are satisfied that, with regard to administrative discrimination, a statutory prohibition would be not only impracticable, but useless, for it would be impossible to regulate by any statute the exercise of its discretion by the Executive. We agree, however, with the proposal in the White Paper¹ that the Governor-General and Governors in their respective spheres should have imposed upon them a special responsibility for the prevention of discrimination, thus enabling them, if action is proposed by their Ministers which would have a discriminatory effect, to intervene and, if necessary, either to decline to accept their advice or (as the case may require) to exercise the special powers which flow from the possession of a special responsibility. But, if our subsequent recommendations on the subject of legislative discrimination are accepted, we think it should be made clear in the Constitution Act that this special responsibility extends to the prevention of administrative discrimination in any of the makers in respect of which provision against legislative discrimination is made under the Act.”

interests would inevitably involve a reopening of the Communal Award, and we have indicated above the objections to be seen to this. But we are in any case of opinion that the representation proposed in the White Paper for landlords, commerce and industry, universities and labour may be regarded as striking a just balance between the claims of the various interests and as affording an adequate representation for them. We observe in particular that the representation of labour has been increased from 9 seats in the present Provincial Legislative Councils to a total of 38, the present marked difference between the representation of labour and of commerce and industry being thus very substantially reduced. Having regard to this, to the large number of seats set aside for the Depressed Classes (whose representatives will to some extent at any rate represent labour interests) and to the extension of the franchise, which will bring on the electoral roll large numbers of the poorer and of the labouring classes, we are of opinion that the position of labour, the importance of which we fully recognise, is adequately safeguarded under the proposals embodied in the White Paper.)

(219 We are of opinion that the proposals in the White Paper on this subject require modification in two directions. In the first place, the White Paper draws no distinction between the execution of Federal Acts with respect to subjects on which the Federal Legislature is alone competent to legislate (List I) and the execution of Federal Acts in the concurrent field (Last III) It is evident that in its exclusive field the Federal Government ought to have power to give directions—detailed and specific if need be—to a provincial Government as proposed in the White Paper. But it is much more doubtful whether it should have such power in the concurrent field. The objects of legislation in this field will be predominantly matters of provincial concern, and the agency by which such legislation will be administered will be almost exclusively a provincial agency. The Federal Legislature will be generally used as an instrument of legislation in this field merely from considerations of practical convenience, and if this procedure were to carry with it automatically an extension of the scope of federal administration, the Provinces might feel that they were exposed to dangerous encroachment. On the other hand, the considerations of practical convenience which would prompt the use of the Federal Legislature in this field will often be the need for securing uniformity in matters of social legislation, and uniformity of legislation will be useless if there is no means of enforcing reasonable uniformity of administration. We think the solution is to be found in drawing a distinction between subjects in the concurrent list which, on the one hand, relate, broadly speaking, to matters of social and economic legislation, and those which, on the other hand, relate mainly to matters of law and order, and personal rights and status. The latter form the larger class, and the enforcement of legislation on these subjects would, for the most part, be in the hands of the Courts or of the provincial authorities responsible for public prosecutions. There can clearly be no question of Federal directions being issued to the Courts, nor could such directions properly be issued to prosecuting authorities in the Provinces. In these matters, therefore, we think that the Federal Government should have in law, as they could have in practice, no powers of administrative control. The other class of concurrent subjects consists mainly of the regulation of mines, factories, employers' liability and workmen's compensation, trade unions, welfare of labour, industrial disputes, infectious diseases, electricity, and cinematograph films. In respect of this class, we think that the Federal Government should, where necessary, have the power to issue general directions for the enforcement of the law, but only to the extent provided by the Federal Act in question. In view of the manner in which we propose to constitute the Federal Legislature, it is improbable that a body so representative of provincial opinion will sanction any unreasonable encroachment upon the provincial field of action, but, as a further safeguard against such encroachment, we think that any clause in a statute conferring such powers should require the previous sanction of the Governor General.")

Paragraph 283 is again read

It is moved by The Lord Eustace Percy and Major Cadogan. Page 161 to leave out paragraph 283 and to insert the following new paragraphs -- (' 283 While we consider that the White Paper provides adequately for the special protection of members of the Secretary of State's Services we are not fully satisfied that the status of other members of the Public Services, and of those Services as a whole, has been made sufficiently clear either in the White Paper or in any of the investigations and discussions which have led up to its preparation. We have already discussed in paragraph 89 the measures necessary to safeguard the moral and efficiency of the Police Service, including its subordinate ranks. In paragraphs 321-325 we shall make certain special proposals in regard to judicial appointments. In addition however to these special recommendations, we think it our duty to make certain general observations on the future of the Public Services as a whole.

283-A It is natural that the process by which during recent years provincial service officers have been gradually substituted for All India officers in the transferred departments and greater powers of control have been delegated to the Provincial Governments should have tended to create a false distinction between the status of the All India Services and that of the Provincial Services. The tendency has almost inevitably been to regard the Provincial Services as having ceased to be Crown Services and as having become Services of the Provincial Governments. This tendency has been emphasised by the argument, frequently advanced and accepted in the past both by Indians and Englishmen that Provincial self-government necessarily entails control by the Provincial Government over the appointment of its servants. This argument has, no doubt great logical force, but it runs the risk of distorting one of the accepted principles of the British Constitution, namely that civil servants are the servants of the Crown and that the Legislature should have no control over their appointment or promotion and only a very general control over their conditions of service. Indeed even the British Cabinet has come to exercise only a very limited control over the Services, control being left very largely to the Prime Minister as so to speak the personal adviser of the Crown in regard to all service matters. The same principle applies, of course equally to the Services recruited by the Secretary of State for India though this fact has been sometimes obscured by inaccurate references to the control of Parliament over the All India Services. But whatever misunderstandings may have arisen in the past as to the real status of the Provincial Services, there ought to be no doubt as to their status under the new Constitution. We have already pointed out that under that Constitution all the powers of the Provincial Governments, including the power to recruit public servants and to regulate their conditions of service will be derived no longer by devolution from the Government of India but directly by delegation from the Crown i.e., directly from the same source as that from which the Secretary of State derives his powers of recruitment. The Provincial Services, no less than the Central Services and the Secretary of State's Services will, therefore, be essentially Crown Services, and the efficiency and moral of those Services will largely depend in the future on the development in India of the same conventions as have grown up in England

"283B But, if such conventions are to develop in India as in England, they must develop from the same starting-point, from a recognition that the Governor, as the personal representative of the Crown and the head of the executive government, has a special relation to all the Crown Services. He will, indeed, be generally bound to act in that relation on the advice of his Ministers, subject to his special responsibility for the rights and legitimate interests of the Services, but his Ministers will be no less bound to remember that advice on matters affecting the organisation of the permanent executive services is a very different thing from advice on matters of legislative policy, and that the difference may well affect both the circumstances and the form in which such advice is tendered. We think, therefore, that the Constitution should contain in its wording a definite recognition of the Governor-General and the Governors respectively as, under the Crown, the heads of the Central (as distinct from the All-India) and Provincial Services. Appointments to these Services would accordingly run in the name of the Governor-General and Governor respectively, and it would, therefore, follow (see paragraph 277 above) that no public servant appointed by the Governor-General or Governor will be subject to dismissal, save by order of the Governor-General or Governor

Governor-General and Governors should be under the Crown, recognised as heads of Central and Provincial Services respectively

"283C But, further than this, it will, in our view, be essential that the Central and Provincial Legislatures respectively should give general legal sanction to the status and rights of the Central and Provincial Services. The Special responsibility of the Governor-General and Governors would, of course, in any case, extend to securing the legitimate interests as well as the rights of members of these Services, but it is on all grounds desirable that the Executive Government as a whole should be authorised and required by law to give these Services the necessary security. The principal existing rights of members of these Services are set out in List II of Appendix VII of the White Paper. We think that the Legislatures, in passing Provincial Civil Service Acts authorising and requiring the Executive Government to give these services the necessary security, would be well advised to consider whether, to meet the new conditions, List II of Appendix VII of the White Paper should be enlarged by appropriate additions from List I of the same Appendix, wherein are set out the principal existing rights of officers appointed by the Secretary of State. In our view the status and rights of the Central and Provincial Services should not be, in substance, inferior to the status and rights of persons appointed by the Secretary of State in regard to the two main points covered by List I. These two points are, protection against individual injury amounting to breach of contract and against individual unfair treatment through disciplinary action or refusal of promotion, and, secondly, protection against such arbitrary alterations in the organisation of the Services themselves as might damage the professional prospects of their members generally. On the first point, these Provincial Civil Service Acts could not, indeed, determine in detail the rates of pay, allowances and pensions, and the conditions of retirement of all Civil Servants, nor the procedure to be followed in considering their promotion on the one hand, or, on the other, their dismissal, removal, reduction or formal censure. Such Acts could, however, confer general powers and duties for these purposes on the Government, and in regard to promotions, they could provide definitely that "canvassing" for promotion or appointments shall disqualify the candidate, and that orders of posting or promotion in the higher grades shall require the personal concurrence of the Governor. On the second point, it is admittedly more difficult to give security to the Services as a whole in respect of their

Status and rights of Central and Provincial Services not to be inferior to those All India Services

general organisation yet the moral of any Service must largely depend upon reasonable prospects of promotion and this must mean that there is a recognised cadre of higher-paid posts which while naturally subject to modification in changing circumstances will not be subject to violent and arbitrary disturbance. A Legislature does nothing derogatory to its own rights and powers if it confers upon the Executive by law the duty of fixing such cadres and of reporting to the Legislature if any post in these cadres is at any time held in abeyance.

283D There is however one existing right of officers appointed by the Secretary of State the application of which as it stands to civil servants in general would be impossible namely the right to non-votability of salaries and pensions. There is, indeed nothing derogatory again, to the rights and powers of the Legislature in the adoption of a special procedure similar to the Consolidated Fund Charges procedure of the British Parliament, under which certain salaries are authorised by permanent statute instead of being voted annually on estimates of supply and this is in fact generally recognised to be a desirable procedure in certain circumstances. But, as we point out below ¹ in a slightly different connection, this procedure could not in practice be applied to the salaries of all public servants. We think, however that it might well be applied by the Provincial Legislatures to certain classes of officers, and in particular to the higher grades of all the services. We make this proposal without prejudice to the proposals in the White Paper which provide that certain heads of expenditure shall not be submitted to the vote of the Provincial Legislatures at all.)

Prior consent of Governor General or Governor should be required to legislation affecting such grants.

(349B It is not unnatural that the holders of privileges such as we have described should be apprehensive lest the grant of responsible government, and the consequent handing over to the control of Ministers and Legislatures of all matters connected with land revenue administration should result in a failure to observe the promises which have been extended by Governments in the past to themselves or their predecessors in interest. Some of the claims to protection which have been urged upon us in this connexion would be satisfied by little less than a statutory declaration which would have the effect of maintaining unaltered and unalterable for all time however strong the justification for its modification might prove to be in the light of changed circumstances, every promise or undertaking of the kind made by the British Government in the past. We could not contemplate so far reaching a limitation upon the natural consequences of the change to responsible government. We recommend however, that the Constitution Act should contain an appropriate provision requiring the prior consent of the Governor General or the Governor as the case may be, to any proposal legislative or executive, which would alter or prejudice the rights of the possessor of any privilege of the kind to which we have referred)

The Permanent Settlement.

(" 349C We have considered whether similar provision should be made to protect the rights of Zamindars and others who are the successors in interest of those in whose favour the Permanent Settlement of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa and Parts of the United Provinces and Madras was made at the end of the 18th century. Briefly the effect of this Settlement was to give a proprietary right in land to the class described as Zamindars, on the understanding, that they collected and paid to Government the revenue assessed on that land which was fixed at rates declared at the time to be intended to stand unaltered in perpetuity. It is apparent that the position of Zamindars under the Permanent Settlement is very different from that of the individual holders of grants or privileges of the kind we have just described for while the privileges of the latter might but for a protection such as we suggest be swept away by a stroke of the pen with little or no injury to any but the holder of the vested interest himself the alteration of the character of land revenue settlement in Bengal, for instance would involve directly or indirectly the interests of vast numbers of the population in addition to those of the comparatively small number of Zamindars proper and might indeed produce an economic revolution of a most far-reaching character. Consequently, no Ministry or Legislature in Bengal could, in fact, embark upon, or at all events carry to a conclusion legislative proposals which would have such results unless they had behind them an overwhelming volume of public support. We do not dispute the fact that the declarations as to the permanence of the Settlement contained in the Regulations under which it was enacted could not have been departed from by the British Government so long as that Government was in effective control of land revenue. But we could not regard this fact as involving the conclusion that it must be placed beyond the legal competence of an Indian Ministry responsible to an Indian Legislature which is to be charged inter alia with the duty of regulating the land revenue system of the Province to alter the enactments embodying the Permanent Settlement, which enactments, despite the promises of permanence they contain, are legally subject (like any other Indian enactments) to repeal or alteration. Nevertheless, we feel that the Permanent Settlement is not a matter for which, as the result of the introduction of Provincial Autonomy, His Majesty's Government can properly disclaim all responsibility. We recommend therefore that the Governor should be instructed to reserve for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure any Bill passed by the Legislature which would alter the character of the Permanent Settlement.")

INTRODUCTION

The Statutory
survey

1 The conditions of the problem with the examination of which we have been entrusted are brilliantly described in the comprehensive survey which forms Volume I of the Report of the Statutory Commission. We are not aware that the accuracy of this survey has been impeached, and we are content to take it both as the starting point and the text book of our own investigation. Nor indeed could we do otherwise for it would have been impossible for us in the time at our disposal to have accumulated and digested so vast a mass of fact and detail. We desire to place on record our deep obligation to the work of the Commission and our conviction that, if we had not had before us the fruits of their patient and exhaustive enquiries, we should scarcely have been able to enter upon, much less to complete within any measurable space of time the task which Parliament has imposed upon us. Nevertheless, if the labours of the Commission have happily relieved us of the task of restating by way of introduction the conditions of the Indian problem there are certain elements in it which must so sensibly affect the judgment which we are invited to form and the recommendations which it will be our duty to make that we may be permitted briefly to refer to them

peoples of India.

2. The sub-continent of India¹ lying between the Himalayas and Cape Comorin comprises an area of 1,670,000 square miles with a population now approaching 310,000,000. Of this area British India

¹ i.e., excluding Burma: see infra para. 45

25 comprises about 820,000, and the Indian States 700,000, square miles, with populations of about 260,000,000 and 80,000,000 respectively. It is inhabited by many races and tribes, speaking over two hundred different languages or dialects, and often as distinct from one another in origin, tradition, and manner of life, as are the 30 nations of Europe. Two-thirds of its inhabitants profess Hinduism in one form or another as their religion, over 77,000,000 are followers of Islam, and the difference between the two is not only one of religion in the stricter sense, but also of race, of law, and of culture. They may be said indeed to represent two distinct and 35 separate civilisations. Hinduism is distinguished by the singular phenomenon of caste, which is the basis of its religious and social system and which, save in a very restricted field, remains unpervious to the more liberal philosophies of the West, the religion of Islam on the other hand is based upon the conception of the equality of 40 man. In addition to these two great communities, there is also to be found an infinite variety of other religions and sects, ranging from 410, excluding Burma: see infra, para 15

- the simple beliefs of Animism to the mystical speculations of the Buddhist. The great majority of the people of India derive their living from the soil and practise for the most part a traditional and self-sufficing type of agriculture. The gross wealth of the country is 5 very considerable, but owing to the vast number of its inhabitants the average standard of living is low and can scarcely be compared even with that of the more backward countries of Europe. Literacy is rare outside urban areas, and even in these the number of literates bears but a small proportion to the total population.
- 10 3 In its political structure India is divided between British India and the Indian States. The latter are nearly 600 in number. They include 109 States, among them great States like Hyderabad, Mysore, Baroda, Kashmir, Gwalior and Travancore, the Rulers of which are entitled to a seat in the Chamber of Princes, 128 which 15 are represented in the Chamber by 12 of their own order elected by themselves, and 327 Estates, Jagirs, and others which are only States in the sense that their territory, often consisting only of a few acres, does not form part of British India. The more important States within their own territories enjoy all the principal attributes 20 of sovereignty, but their external relations are in the hands of the Paramount Power. The sovereignty of others is of a more restricted kind, and over others again the Paramount Power exercises in varying degrees an administrative control.
- 4 British India consists of nine Governors' Provinces (excluding 25 Burma), together with certain other areas administered under the Government of India itself. The Governors' Provinces possess a considerable measure of executive and legislative independence, but over all of them the Government of India and the Central Legislature can exercise executive and legislative authority. In 30 respect of certain matters, known as transferred subjects the Provincial Executives are responsible to their Legislatures, but the Governor-General in Council is independent of the Central Legislature and responsible only to the Secretary of State and through him to Parliament. An official bloc forms part of both the Central and 35 Provincial Legislatures and in general acts in accordance with the wishes of the Governor-General and Provincial Governors respectively. British India is administered through a number of services, some of them all-India services, and some provincial. Of the former the most important is the Indian Civil Service, recruited by the

Features of present
constitution

5 Such in the barest outline is the present constitutional structure of British India, into the details of which we shall have occasion to enter with more particularity when we deal with the specific proposals of the White Paper in their order. It will be seen that its main features are a Central Executive responsible only to the Secretary of State and through him to Parliament Provincial Executives exercising powers over a wide field, responsible in certain matters but not in others to the Provincial Legislatures and Central and Provincial Legislatures exercising the law making power but with no control over the Executive in one case and with only a limited control in the other. Yet notwithstanding the measure of devolution on the Provincial authorities which was the outcome of the Act of 1919 the Government of India is and remains in essence a unitary and centralised Government, with the Governor General in Council as the keystone of the whole constitutional edifice and it is through the Governor General in Council that the Secretary of State and ultimately Parliament discharge their responsibilities for the peace, order and good government of India.

The British
achievement

6 British rule in India stands in no need of apologetics, but it is well to remember what its specific achievement has been. It has given to India that which throughout the centuries she has never possessed, a Government whose authority is unquestioned in any part of the sub-Continent. It has barred the way against the foreign invader and has maintained tranquillity at home. It has established the rule of law and, by the creation of a just administration and an incorruptible magistracy, it has secured to every subject of His Majesty in British India the right to go in peace about his daily work and to retain for his own use the fruit of his labours. It is well also to remember how small is the British element in the administrative and judicial services which have been the chief agents of this work. The total European population of British India to-day including some 60 000 British troops, is only 135 000. The total British element in the Superior Services is about 3 160 and of these there are approximately 800 in the Indian Civil Service and 500 in the Indian Police.

The Mogul Empire

7 The success of British Rule cannot be justly estimated without reference to the condition of things which preceded it. The arts of government and administration were not indeed unknown to Moguls and the strong hand of the Emperors who reigned between 1525 and 1707 maintained a State which ultimately embraced the larger part of India and did not suffer by comparison with, if it did not even surpass in splendour the contemporary monarchies of Europe. But the strength of the Mogul Empire depended essentially upon the personal qualities of its ruling House, and when the succession of great Emperors failed its collapse inevitably followed nor during its most magnificent period was its authority unchallenged either within or without its borders. Its system of government resembled that of other Asiatic despotisms. The interests of the subject races were made subservient to the ambitions and often to the caprices, of the monarch; for the politic toleration of Akbar found no imitator among his successors. The imperial splendour became the measure of the people's poverty and their sufferings are said by a French observer long resident at the Court of Aurangzeb to have been beyond the power of words to describe.

- 8 There are pages in the history of India, between the collapse of the Mogul Empire and the final establishment of British supremacy, which even to-day cannot be read without horror. With but brief intervals of relief, vast tracts were given over to the internecine struggles of the princes, the guerilla warfare of petty chiefs, and the exactions of Indian and European adventurers, and to townsmen and peasants alike the helpless victims of malice domestic, foreign levy, and (the whole apparatus of) anarchy, it might have seemed that the sum of human misery was complete. It is in the improvement which has taken place in Indian agriculture since the establishment of peace and security, that the Royal Commission in 1928 found a measure of the extent to which husbandry had been injured and its progress delayed by the long period of disorder and unrest that preceded the British occupation. The post-Mogul Period
- 15 9 Such were the conditions out of which British rule created a new and stable polity, not without the support and co-operation of Indians themselves. Peace and order were re-established, the relations of the Indian States with one another and with the Crown were finally determined, and the rule of law made effective throughout the whole of British India. On this solid foundation the majestic structure of the Government of India rests, and it can be claimed with certainty that in the period which has elapsed since 1858, when the Crown assumed supremacy over all the territories of the East India Company, the intellectual and material progress of India has been greater than it was ever within her power to achieve during any other period of her long and chequered history. Restoration of peace and order
- 10 We have emphasised the magnitude of the British achievement in India because it is this very achievement that has created the problem which we have been commissioned by Parliament to consider. By transforming British India into a single unitary State, it has engendered among Indians a sense of political unity. By giving that State a Government disinterested enough to play the part of an impartial arbiter and powerful enough to control the disruptive forces generated by religious, racial and linguistic divisions, it has fostered the first beginnings, at least, of a sense of nationality, transcending those divisions. By establishing conditions in which the performance of the fundamental functions of government, the enforcement of law and order and the maintenance of an upright administration have come to be too easily accepted as a matter of course, it has freed the mind of an acute and ingenious race to turn to other things—and, in particular to speculation upon the forms of government. Finally, by directing this speculation towards the object lessons of British constitutional history and by accustoming the Indian student of government to express his political ideas in the English language, it has favoured the growth of a body of opinion inspired by two familiar British conceptions; that good government is not enough without self-government, and that the only form of self-government worthy of the name is Influence of British constitutional ideas.

- government by Ministers responsible to an elected Legislature. Indians, so trained and influenced, have not been slow to observe that the Government of India has itself been one of the most significant examples of this principle of responsibility for its accountability to Parliament, so constantly insisted on by Englishmen of all schools of political thought, has given it a quality of stability and permanence impossible of attainment otherwise under a system of personal rule.

Reality of Indian political aspirations.

11 The Indian problem cannot be understood unless the reality of these political aspirations is frankly recognised at the outset 10 There is ample evidence that enlightened Indian opinion has a very just appreciation of the benefits derived from the British connection but the attachment of a people to its government is not always determined by a dispassionate calculation of material interest still less by sentiments of mere gratitude. The subtle ferment of 15 education the impact of the War and the beginnings of that sense of nationality to which we have referred have combined to create a public opinion in India which it would be a profound error for Parliament to ignore. It is true of course, that those who entertain these aspirations constitute but a small fraction of the vast population of India and that in these circumstances alleged manifestations of public opinion are often of doubtful value. Nevertheless, a public opinion does exist strong enough to affect what has been the main strength of the Government of India for many generations — its instinctive acceptance by the mass of the Indian people. To 25 the cultivators who make up nine-tenths of the population an equitable land revenue settlement and the timely advent of the monsoon may be of more importance than any projects of constitutional reform but when they find that neither just administration nor good monsoons can ensure a remunerative price for their produce their lack of political ideas may make them more rather than less, receptive of political arguments. History has repeatedly shown the unwisdom of judging the political consciousness of a people by the standard of its least instructed class, and the creation of the British Empire as we know it to-day has been mainly 35 due to the fact that for the last hundred and fifty years British policy has been guided by a more generous appreciation of the value and a more estimate of the influence of what is sometimes called a politically minded class.

The Preamble of the Act of 1919.

12 British policy has certainly been so guided in India during 40 recent years. It has conferred on the people of India, by the Act of 1919 wide powers of self government and during the last six or seven years, from the appointment of the Statutory Commission onwards, it has been consistently directed to working out in free collaboration with Indians themselves, the lines of a new and more 45 permanent constitution. In particular for the first time in the history of India representatives of her Princes and peoples have sat for many months in council with representatives of His Majesty's Government and of the great political Parties of the United Kingdom and for the first time in the history of Parliament Indian delegates have taken part in the proceedings of a Joint Select Committee and have illuminated our discussions, even in 5 circumstances forbade them to share our responsibilities. But above all in the Preamble to the Act of 1919 Parliament has set out finally and definitely the ultimate aims of British rule in India. Subsequent statements of policy have added nothing to the substance of this declaration and we think it well to quote it here in full as 10 setting once and for all the attitude of the British Parliament and people towards the political aspirations of which we have spoken —

Whereas it is the declared policy of Parliament to provide for the increasing association of Indians in every branch of Indian administration and for the gradual development of 15

self-governing institutions, with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government in British India as an integral part of the empire

20 "And whereas progress in giving effect to this policy can only be achieved by successive stages, and it is expedient that substantial steps in this direction should now be taken

"And whereas the time and manner of each advance can be determined only by Parliament, upon whom responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian peoples

25 "And whereas the action of Parliament in such matters must be guided by the co-operation received from those on whom new opportunities of service will be conferred, and by the extent to which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility

30 "And whereas concurrently with the gradual development of self governing institutions in the Provinces of India it is expedient to give to those Provinces in provincial matters the largest measure of independence of the Government of India, which is compatible with the due discharge by the latter of its 35 own responsibilities "

13 But a recognition of Indian aspirations, while it is the necessary preface to any study of Indian constitutional problems, is an insufficient guide to their solution. Responsible government to which these aspirations are mainly directed to-day, is not an 40 automatic device which can be manufactured to specification. It is not even a machine which will run on a motive power of its own. The student of government who assumes that British constitutional theory can be applied at will in any country, misses the fact that 45 it could not be successfully applied even in Great Britain if it were not modified in a hundred ways by unwritten laws and tacit conventions. It is not unnatural that, in the words of the Statutory Commission, most of the constitutional schemes propounded by Constitutional theory in practice.

Indians should closely follow the British model, but the successful working of that model postulates the existence of certain conditions, which are as essential as they are difficult to define. As Lord Bryce has remarked, "the English constitution, which we admire as a 5 masterpiece of delicate equipoises and complicated mechanism, would anywhere but in England be full of difficulties and dangers. It works by a body of understanding which no writer can formulate and of habits which centuries have been needed to instil." It is superfluous to adduce examples, but two of the most important 10 may be cited, the powers of the Prime Minister and the position of the Civil Service. Of the first Mr Gladstone said that "nowhere in the world does so great a substance cast so small a shadow"; of the second Professor Lowell has pointed out that both the civil servant's "abstinence from politics" and his "permanence of 15 tenure" have been "secured by the force of public opinion hardening into tradition, and not by the sanction of law." Above all, the understanding and habits of which Lord Bryce speaks are in the main the creation of, as they have in their turn helped to promote, the growth of mutual confidence between the great parties in the 20 State, a confidence based on the fundamental beliefs, transcending the political differences of the hour, which each has come to repose in the good faith and motives of the other. Experience has shown only too clearly that a technique which the British people have thus painfully developed in the course of many generations is not to be 25 acquired by other communities in the twinkling of an eye, nor, when acquired is it likely to take the same form as in Great Britain, but rather to be moulded in its course of development by social conditions and national aptitudes

Difference between the letter and spirit of British constitutional doctrine.

14 Experience has shown, too, how easily the framers of written constitutions may be misled by deceptive analogies succeeding 30 only in reproducing what they suppose to be the letter of British constitutional theory while ignoring the spirit and the living growth of British constitutional practice. The classic instance of such misconceptions is offered by the constitution of the United States whose authors decided to keep the legislative branch absolutely 35 distinct from the executive branch, largely because they believed such a separation to exist in the English which the wisest of them thought the best constitution. * That error may seem absurd enough to modern students of politics but the mere copyist of British institutions would fall into even more dangerous errors to-day if he 40 were to assume that an Act of Parliament can establish similar institutions in India merely by reproducing such provisions as are to be found in the constitutional law of the United Kingdom. It is certain, on the contrary as we shall show that such an Act must seek to give statutory form to many safeguards which are 45 essential to the proper working of parliamentary government but which in Great Britain have no sanction save that of established custom and when this is done it will remain true that parliamentary government in India may well develop on lines different from those of government at Westminster 50

* Bagshot: The British Constitution.

Constitutional development
evolutionary

15 If then the long collaboration of Englishmen and Indians during recent years is to result in the enactment of a constitution which will work successfully under Indian conditions we shall do well to discard theories and analogies and instead to base our scheme on the government of India as it exists to-day. That was the 5 line of approach which was adopted by the Statutory Commission and which has increasingly been followed in the deliberations of the Round Table Conferences and in our own consultations with the Indian delegates. It is also the line which Parliament has followed in the past in framing the constitutions of the self governing 10 Dominions. If the constitutions of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa were framed on the British model it was not because Parliament decided on theoretical grounds to reproduce that model in those countries, but because government in those countries had been long conducted on British principles and had 15 already grown into general conformity with British practice. If these constitutions enacted over a period of more than forty years differ from one another in certain points those differences are not to be attributed to change in British constitutional theory so much as to variations in the experience and practice of the particular 20 communities themselves. In India too there is already a system of government which while possessing many special characteristics, is no less based on British principles and is no less a living organism. Already long before either the Morley Minto or the Montagu Chelmsford reforms that government had shown a marked tendency 25 to develop on certain lines. The safest hypothesis on which we can proceed and the one most in accordance with our constitutional history is that the future government of India will be successful in proportion as it represents not a new creation substituted for an old one but the natural evolution of an existing government and the 30 natural extension of its past tendencies.

16 It is from this point of view that Parliament may well approach the first and basic proposal which has been submitted to us, the proposal to found the new constitutional system in India, on the principle of Provincial Autonomy. That proposal has been so fully considered and so precisely formulated by the Statutory Commission that we do not propose to discuss its details in this introductory part of our Report. It is however, important to observe that, far-reaching as is this constitutional change it is not a break with the past. Every student of Indian problems, whatever his prepossession from the Joint Select Committee of 1919 to the Statutory Commission and from the Statutory Commission onwards has been driven in the direction of Provincial Autonomy not by any abstract love of decentralisation, but by the inexorable force of facts. Moreover, the same facts had already set the Government of India moving in the same direction, long before the emergence of the constitutional problem in its present form. When that problem did emerge, a long and steady process of natural development

administrative devolution from the Government of India to the Provincial Governments had already profoundly affected the whole structure of Indian administration. In particular, this gradual course of devolution had produced three important results. It had tended to remove Provincial administration from the immediate purview of His Majesty's Government and, by thus weakening the direct accountability of Indian administrators to Parliament, it had, perhaps, rendered inevitable the introduction, in some degree, of local responsible government. At the same time, it had tended to make the Provinces the centres of the development of social services and it had also tended to transfer to the Provincial Executives the prime responsibility for the preservation of law and order. From these three changes the three main features of Provincial Autonomy are directly derived.

17 In the first place, the Act of 1919 introduced a large measure of responsible government in the Provinces, and the governments thus established have now been in operation for more than a decade. Opinions may differ widely as to the success of this experiment, but we agree with the conclusion reached by the Statutory Commission, that its development has now reached a stage when it has outgrown the limits imposed upon it by the Act of 1919. The present dyarchic system in the Provinces, as the Commission pointed out though designed to develop a sense of responsibility, has sometimes tended to encourage a wholly different attitude. A sense of responsibility is an attribute of character, not a garment to be put on or discarded at will, according to the particular social function which the wearer may be attending at the moment. The Statutory Commission rightly observes that it can only be acquired by making men responsible politically for the effects of their own actions, and their sense of responsibility must be enormously weakened if the action of government is split up into watertight compartments, partitioned off by the clauses of a constitution. Hence, the recommendation of the Statutory Commission, which we endorse, that the dyarchic system should be abolished, and that Provincial Ministers should be made generally responsible over the whole field of Provincial government.

18 Secondly in the sphere of social administration, it is evident that a point has been reached where further progress depends upon the assumption by Indians of real responsibility for Indian social conditions. Englishmen may legitimately claim that, for the greater government and social legislation

part of her material and intellectual progress, India has been mainly 40 indebted to British rule. But from one aspect of Indian life British rule has tended to stand aside: it has followed a policy of neutrality and non-interference in all matters which touch the religions of India. It is not difficult to justify that policy, but so closely are the habits 45 and customs of the people bound up with their religious beliefs that the effect has been to put grave obstacles in the way of social legislation by the Government of India in such matters (to name only two obvious instances) as child marriage and the problem of the untouchables. These obstacles can only be removed by Indian hands. We are under no illusion as to the difficulty of that task but we are clear that under responsible government alone can it be 5 attempted with any prospect of success.

Committee of responsible government.

19 But the third aspect of Provincial Autonomy is still as it has been from time immemorial the most difficult and the most important. Among the many problems arising out of the process of devolution the most vital one is how best to ensure the continuity of the Provincial executives in the performance of what, in an earlier 10 paragraph we referred to as the fundamental functions of government: the enforcement of law and order and the maintenance of an upright administration. Because these are the fundamental functions of government and because there is no greater danger to good government than the tendency to take their performance for 15 granted we have come as will later appear to the same conclusion as the Statutory Commission that Provincial Ministers must be made responsible for their performance. But it is well to remember what according to British constitutional practice, is the nature of that responsibility. It is a responsibility which no executive can share 20 with any legislature: however answerable it may be to that legislature for the manner of its discharge. That has been true of the relationship of the Government of India to Parliament in the past; it must remain true of the relationship of Provincial Ministers to Provincial Legislatures in the future. It is appropriate that this 25 principle of executive independence should be expressed in the Constitution by the conferment of special powers and responsibilities on the Governor as the head of the Provincial executive. This raises a wider question on which a further word must be said.

British conception of Parliamentary government.

20. In establishing or extending parliamentary government in 30 the Provinces, Parliament must take into account the facts of Indian life. Parliamentary government, as it is understood in the United Kingdom, works by the interaction of four essential factors: the principle of majority rule; the willingness of the minority for the time being to accept the decisions of the majority; the existence 35 of two organised political parties differing on questions of policy but each confident (in the other's good faith and public spirit) and finally the existence of a mobile body of political opinion owing no permanent allegiance to either Party and therefore able, by its instinctive reaction against extravagant movements on one side or the other to keep the vessel on an even keel. In India none of these 40 factors can be said to exist to-day. There are no parties, as we understand them, and no mobile body of political opinion. In their place we are confronted with the age-old antagonism of Hindu and Muhammadan, representatives not only of two religions but of 45 two civilisations with numerous self-contained and exclusive minorities all a prey to anxiety for their future and profoundly suspicious of the majority and of one another, and with the rigid divisions of caste (itself a denial of every democratic principle) In these circumstances, communal representation must be accepted as inevitable at the present time, but it is a strange commentary on some of the democratic professions to which we have listened We lay stress on these facts because in truth they are of the essence of the problem and we should be doing no good service to India by glazing them over These difficulties must be faced, not only by Parliament, but by Indians themselves It is impossible to predict whether, or how soon, a new sense of provincial citizenship, combined with the growth of parties representing divergent economic and social interests, may prove strong enough to absorb and obliterate the religious and racial cleavages which thus dominate Indian political life Meanwhile it must be recognised that, if free play were given to the powerful forces which would be set in motion by an unqualified system of parliamentary government, the consequences would be disastrous to India, and perhaps irreparable In these circumstances, the successful working of parliamentary government in the Provinces must depend, in a special degree, on the extent to which Parliament can translate the customs of the British constitution into statutory "safeguards"

21 That word, like other words repeatedly used in recent discussions, has become a focus of misunderstandings both in England and India To many Englishmen it conveys the idea of an ineffective rearguard action, masking a position already evacuated, to many Indians it seems to imply a selfish reservation of powers inconsistent with any real measure of responsible government Since it is too late to invent a new terminology, we must make it clear that we use the word in a more precise and quite different sense On the one hand, the safeguards we contemplate have nothing in common with those mere paper declarations which have been sometimes inserted in constitutional documents, and which are dependent for their validity on the goodwill or the timidity of the men or the institutions to whom the real substance of power has been transferred They represent, on the contrary (to quote a very imperfect but significant analogy) a retention of power as substantial and as fully endorsed by the laws, as that vested by the Constitution of the United States in the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army—but more extensive both in respect of their scope and in respect of the circumstances in which they can be brought into play On the other hand, they are not only not inconsistent with some form of responsible government, but in the present circumstances of India it is no paradox to say that they are the necessary complement to any form of it, without which it could have little or no hope of success It is in exact proportion as Indians show themselves to be not only capable of taking and exercising responsibility but able to supply the missing factors in Indian political life of which we have spoken, that both the need for safeguards and their use will disappear We propose to

with responsible

examine later in this Report the nature of the safeguards required, but we think it right to formulate here what seem to us to be the essential elements in the new constitutional settlement which these safeguards should be designed to supply

22 The first is flexibility, so that opportunity may be afforded for the natural processes of evolution with a minimum of alteration

for flexibility

in the constitutional framework itself. The deplorable and paralyzing effect of prescribing a fixed period for constitutional revision requires no comment in the light of events since 1919 but we are also impressed with the advantage of giving full scope for the development in India of that undefinable body of understanding of political instinct and of tradition, which Lord Bryce in the passage which we have quoted postulates as essential to the working of our own constitution. The success of a constitution depends, indeed, far more upon the manner and spirit in which it is worked than upon its formal provisions. It is impossible to foresee so strange and perplexing are the conditions of the problem the exact lines which constitutional development will eventually follow and it is therefore the more desirable that those upon whom responsibility will rest should have all reasonable scope for working out their own salvation by the method of trial and error. In other words, as the Statutory Commission emphasised in their Report, the new Indian Constitution must contain within itself the seeds of growth

(for a strong executive);

23 Next there is the necessity for securing strong Executives in the Provinces. We have little to add to what the Statutory Commission have written on this point and in our judgment they do not exaggerate when they say that nowhere in the world is there such frequent need for courageous and prompt action as in India and that nowhere is the penalty for hesitation and weakness greater. We do not doubt that Indian Ministers like others before them, will realise this truth but, in view of the parliamentary weaknesses which we have pointed out the risk of divided counsels and therefore of feebleness in action is not one which can be ignored. We have no wish to underrate the legislative function but in India the executive function is, in our judgment of overriding importance. In the absence of disciplined political parties the sense of responsibility may well be of slower growth in the Legislatures and the threat of a dissolution can scarcely be the same potent instrument in a country where by the operation of a system of communal representation, a newly elected Legislature will often have the same complexion as the old. We touch here the core of the problem of responsible government in the new Indian Constitution and we shall examine it in greater detail in the body of our Report. Here we content ourselves with saying that there must be (to quote again the Statutory Commission) an executive power in each Province which can step in and save the situation before it is too late and this power must be vested in the Governor

(for an efficient administration);

24 But, further a strong Executive is impossible and the power thus vested in the Governor would be useless, in the absence of a pure and efficient administration the backbone of all good government. The establishment of a public service at once disinterested and incorruptible is not the least of the benefits which British rule has given to India and it is perhaps the most prized. But the efficiency of a service is no less vital than its honesty. In no country perhaps does the whole fabric of government depend to a greater degree than in India upon its administration and it is indeed literally true as the Statutory Commission observe that the life of millions of the population depends on the existence of a thoroughly efficient administrative system. But no service can be efficient if it has cause for anxiety or discontent. It is therefore essential that those whose duty it is to work this system should be freed from anxiety as to their status and prospects under the new constitution and that new entrants should not be discouraged by any apprehension of inequitable treatment. We have every hope that such anxieties or apprehensions will prove unfounded, but they may be none the less real on that account, and, so long as they exist, it is necessary that all reasonable measures should be taken to quiet them

25 Lastly, there must be an authority in India, armed with adequate powers, able to hold the scales evenly between conflicting interests and to protect those who have neither the influence nor the ability to protect themselves. Such an authority will be as necessary in the future as experience has proved it to be in the past. It must, generally speaking, be vested primarily in the Provincial Governors, but their authority must be closely linked with, and must be focussed in, a similar authority vested in the Governor-General, as responsible to the Crown and Parliament for the peace and tranquillity of India as a whole, (and for the protection of all the weak and helpless among her people). This leads us naturally to a consideration of the next point in the Indian constitutional problem—the form and character of the Central Government

26 If the establishment of Provincial autonomy marks, not so much a new departure, as the next stage in a path which India has long been treading, it is the more necessary that, on entering this stage, we should pause to take stock of the direction in which we have been moving. We have spoken of unity as perhaps the greatest gift which British rule has conferred on India, but, in transferring so many of the powers of government to the Provinces and in encouraging them to develop a vigorous and independent political life of their own, we have been running the inevitable risk of weakening or even destroying that unity. Provincial Autonomy is, in fact, an inconceivable policy unless it is accompanied by such an adaptation of the structure of the Central Legislature as will bind these autonomous units together. In other words, the necessary consequence of Provincial Autonomy in British India is a British-India Federal Assembly. In recent discussions, the word "federation" has become identified with the proposals for an All-India Federation and for the establishment, in the common phrase, of "responsibility at the Centre," both of which proposals we shall have to discuss in a moment. But federation is, of course, simply the method by which a number of governments autonomous in their own sphere, are combined in a single State. A Federal Legislature capable of performing this function need not necessarily control the Federal Executive through responsible Ministers chosen from among its members, indeed, as we shall show later, the central government of a purely British-India Federation could not, in our opinion, be appropriately framed on this model. But a Federal Legislature must be constituted on different lines from the central legislature of a unitary State. The Statutory Commission realised this truth and proposed a new form of legislature at the Centre specifically designed to secure the essential unity of British India. As will later appear, we agree in general with the Commission's recommendations on this point, and we prefer them to the proposals contained in the White Paper

27 Of course, in thus converting a unitary State into a Federation we are taking a step for which there is no exact historical precedent. Federations have commonly resulted from an agreement between independent or, at least, autonomous governments, surrendering a defined part of their sovereignty or autonomy to a new central organism. At the present moment, the British India Provinces are not even autonomous for they are subject to both the administrative and the legislative control of the Government of India, and such authority as they exercise has in the main been devolved upon them under a statutory rule making power by the Governor General in Council. We are faced therefore with the necessity of creating autonomous units and combining them into a federation by one and the same act. But it is obvious that we have no alternative. To create autonomous units without any corresponding adaptation of the existing Central Legislature would be as the Statutory Commission saw to give full play to the powerful centrifugal forces of Provincial Autonomy without any attempt to counteract them and to ensure the continued unity of India. We obviously could not take the responsibility of recommending to Parliament a course fraught with such serious risks. The actual establishment of the new central legislature may without danger be deferred for so long as may be necessary to complete arrangements for an All India Federation, if Parliament should decide to adopt that policy but its form must be defined in the Constitution Act itself.

28 The same reasoning does not, however, apply to the further proposal laid before us that the Constitution Act should also determine the form and conditions of an All India Federation, including the Indian States. This is a separate operation which may proceed simultaneously with the introduction of Provincial Autonomy and the reconstitution of the Central Legislature, but which must be carried out by different methods and raises quite distinct issues of policy. We will leave questions of method to be considered in the body of our Report, but the issues of policy must be briefly discussed here.

The Indian States and an All India Federation composed of disparate units.

29 The Statutory Commission looked forward to the ultimate establishment of a Federation of Indian States and Provinces and they recommended that until this ideal could be realized policies affecting British India and the States should be discussed between the parties in a consultative but not legislative council of Greater India consisting of representatives drawn from the States and the British India Legislature. The Commission did not anticipate that the Princes would be willing to enter an All India Federation without some preliminary experience of the joint deliberation which they had suggested on matters of common concern and no doubt the Commission saw in this procedure the means of overcoming, by a process of trial and error the difficulties of establishing an All India Federation. These difficulties are obvious, and again, they are quite distinct from the difficulties involved in the constitution of a British India Federation. The main difficulties are two that the Indian States are wholly different in status and character from the Provinces of British India and that they are not prepared to federate on the same terms as it is proposed to apply to the Provinces. On the first point the Indian States, unlike the British India Provinces, possess sovereignty in various degrees and they are broadly speaking under a system of personal government. Their accession to a Federation cannot therefore take place otherwise than by the voluntary act of the Ruler of each State and, after accession, the representatives of the acceding State in the Federal Legislature will be nominated by the Ruler and its subjects will continue to owe allegiance to him. On the second point, the Rulers have made it clear that while they are willing to consider federation now with the Provinces of British India on certain terms, they could not as 35 sovereign States, agree to the exercise by a Federal Government in relation to them of a range of powers identical in all respects with those which that Government will exercise in relation to the Provinces on whom autonomy has yet to be conferred. We have here an obvious anomaly—a Federation composed of disparate 10 constituent units, in which the powers and authority of the Central Government will differ as between one constituent unit and another.

30 Against these undoubted difficulties, we have to place one great consideration of substance, which appears to us to outweigh the disadvantages of any formal anomalies. The unity of India 15 on which we have laid so much stress is dangerously imperfect so long as the Indian States have no constitutional relationship with British India. It is this fact, surely, that has influenced the Rulers of India, and has endangered without a constitutional relationship between States and British India.

of the Indian States in their recent policy. They remain perfectly free to continue, if they so choose, in the political isolation which has characterized their history since the establishment of the British connexion. But they have, it appears, become keenly conscious of 5 the imperfections of the Indian policy as it exists to-day. A completely united Indian polity cannot, it is true, be established either now or, so far as human foresight can extend, at any time. In most respects, the anomalies to which we have referred are the necessary incidents, not merely of the introduction of an All-India Federation 10 at this moment, but of its introduction at any time in the future.
 So far as we are aware, no section of opinion in this country or in British India is prepared to forego an All-India Federation as an ultimate aim of British policy. Certainly, the Statutory Commission was not prepared to do so, and it is the ideal which they 15 indicated in their report which has since won so much support among the Indian Princes. The question for decision is whether the measure of unity which can be achieved by an All-India Federation, imperfect though it may be, is likely to confer added strength, stability, and prosperity on India as a whole—that is to say, both on 20 the States and on British India. To this question, there can, we think, be only one answer—an affirmative one, and that answer does not rest only, or even chiefly, on the kind of general considerations which naturally appeal most strongly to Englishmen. From the point of view of Englishmen, it is, indeed, evident enough that 25 Ruling Princes who have been in the past the firmest friends of British rule, but who have sometime felt their friendship tried by decisions of the Government of India running counter to what they believed to be the interests of their States and peoples, may be expected, as members of a Federation, to strengthen it precisely in 30 those directions in which Englishmen fear that it may prove weak, and to become helpful collaborators in policies which they are at present inclined to criticise or even to obstruct. But an even stronger, and a much more concrete, argument is to be found in the existing economic condition of India.

35 31 The existing arrangements under which economic policies, vitally affecting the interests of India as a whole have to be formulated and carried out are being daily put to an ever-increasing strain, as the economic life of India develops. For instance, any imposition of internal indirect taxation in British India involves, 40 with few exceptions, the conclusion of agreements with a number of States for concurrent taxation within their frontiers, or in default of such agreement, the establishment of some system of internal customs duties—an impossible alternative, even if it were not Economic ties between States and British India.

precluded by the terms of the Crown's treaties with some States. Worse than this, India may be said even to lack a general customs 45 system uniformly applied throughout the sub-Continent. On the one hand with certain exceptions the States are free themselves to impose internal customs policies, which cannot but obstruct the flow of trade. Even at the maritime ports situated in the States, the administration of the tariffs is imperfectly co-ordinated with that of the British India ports, while the separate rights of the States in these respects are safeguarded by long standing treaties or usage acknowledged by the Crown. On the other hand, tariff 5 policies, in which every part of India is interested are laid down by a Government of India and British India legislature in which no Indian State has a voice though the States constitute somewhat less than half the area and one-sixth of the population of India. Even where the Government of India has adequate powers to impose 10 internal indirect taxation or to control economic development, as in the cases of salt and opium, the use of those powers has caused much friction, and has often left behind it, in the States, a sense of injustice. Moreover a common company law for India, a common banking law a common body of legislation on copyright and trade- 15 marks, a common system of communications, are alike impossible. Conditions such as these, which have caused trouble and uneasiness in the past, are already becoming and must in the future increasingly become intolerable as industrial and commercial development spreads from British India to the States. On all these points the 20 Federation now contemplated would have power to adopt a common policy. That common policy should be subject, no doubt, to some reservation of special treaty rights by certain States and, in the States generally its enforcement would, in many respects, rest with officers appointed by the State Rulers but, even so modified, it 25 would mark a long step from incoherence towards order. In these times when experience is daily proving the need for the close co-ordination of policies, we cannot believe that Parliament, while introducing a new measure of decentralisation in British India, would be wise to neglect the opportunity now offered to it of 30 establishing a new centre of common action for India as a whole.

The States and responsibility at the Centre.

32. An All India Federation thus presents solid advantages from the point of view alike of His Majesty's Government, of British India and of the Indian States. But the attraction of the idea to the States clearly depends on the fulfilment of one condition that, in 35 acceding to the Federation, they should be assured of a real voice in the determination of its policy. The Princes have, therefore, stated clearly in their declaration that they are willing now to enter an All India Federation, but only if the Federal Government is a responsible and not an irresponsible government. This brings us to 40 the last of the main issues which have been submitted to our consideration the issue whether in the common phrase, there shall or shall not be any degree of "responsibility at the Centre."

Responsibility without the States not a solution of the problem.

33 It is obvious at the outset, that the very ground on which the Princes advocate responsibility at the Centre in an All India 45 Federation constitutes the strongest possible argument against responsibility at the Centre in a purely British India Federation for a British India Centre would have to deal, as now with matters intimately affecting the States, yet would, as now be unable to give the States any effective voice in its deliberations. If the States are asked by the exercise of such powers by the present Government 5 of India, their exercise by Ministers responsible to a purely British Indian electorate could hardly fail to lead to serious friction. Indeed, the position of the Governor-General in such circumstances, as the sole representative of the Crown in its treaty relations with the States and, therefore, as the sole mediator between a British Indian 10 electorate and the State Rulers, would be an almost impossible one.

 We agree, therefore, with the Statutory Commission in thinking that a responsible British Indian Centre is not a possible solution of the constitutional problem, or would, at most, only be possible at the price of very large deductions from the scope of its responsi-15 bility.

34 But the Statutory Commission went further than this. They considered the question of responsibility at the Centre from another angle also. It is unnecessary to repeat all that they said on the subject, but they realised, as every student of the problem must 20 realise, that responsible government at the Centre could not in any case, extend to all departments of the Central Government, and that, in any case, it would be necessary to reserve Defence and Foreign Affairs from the sphere of Ministerial responsibility. Hence any measure of responsible government at the Centre must involve a 25 system of dyarchy, and the Commission held strongly the view that a unitary Government at the Centre was essential and should be preserved at all costs. "It must be a Government," they wrote, "able to bear the vast responsibilities which are cast upon it as the central executive organ of a sub-continent, presenting complicated 30 and diverse features which it has been our business to describe", and they expressed the opinion that a plan based on dyarchy was unworkable and would, indeed, constitute no real advance in the direction of developing central responsibility. In this connection we may usefully quote one passage from the Report of the Statutory 35 Commission on the working of dyarchy in the Provinces. "The practical difficulty in the way of achieving the objective of dyarchy and of obtaining a clear demarcation of responsibility arises not so much in the inner counsels of government as in the eyes of the Legislature, the electorate and the public. Provincial Legislatures
 40 were by the nature of the Constitution set the difficult task of discharging two different functions at the same time. In the one sphere, they were to exercise control over policy, in the other, while free to criticise and vote or withhold supply, they were to have no responsibility. The inherent difficulty of keeping this 45 distinction in mind has been intensified by the circumstances under which the Councils have worked to such an extent that perhaps the most important feature of the working of dyarchy in the Provincial Councils, when looked at from the constitutional aspect, is the marked tendency of the Councils to regard the Government as a whole, to think of Ministers as on a footing not very different from that of Executive Councillors, to forget the extent of the opportunities of the Legislatures on the transferred side, and to magnify 5 their functions in the reserved field."

35 These are undoubtedly formidable objections, but they do not, we think, exhaust the question. It is impossible adequately to discuss the real issues involved in a decision for or against the introduction of some measure of responsibility at the Centre if the discussion is 10 confined to the Centre itself and is conducted in terms of "dyarchy". Like so many other words used in political controversy, "dyarchy"

Possible divisions of responsibility;

has collected round it associations which tend to obscure issues rather than to clarify them. The truth is that, in any constitution, and above all in a Federal constitution, there must be a division of responsibility at some point and at that point there will always be a danger of friction. In framing a constitution, the problem is to draw the line at a point where these necessary evils will be minimised and the line will be drawn at different points according to the character and problems of the particular country concerned. It may be drawn at a point where the powers which are reserved from the normal operation of the constitution have in ordinary times, little or no practical effect on the formulation and execution of policy—as for instance the line drawn in the British North America Act between the powers of the Governor-General and the powers of the Governor-General in Council. But in India no easy solution of this kind is possible. There the line drawn must reserve to the Governor-General large powers which will have an important effect upon the policy of the government as a whole. Broadly speaking, three possible lines of division have been suggested to us, each of which deserves to be briefly discussed.

(1) in the provincial sphere:
36 One is a line drawn within the sphere of the Provincial Governments in such a way as to reserve to the Provincial Governors the responsibility for the maintenance of law and order and to the Governor-General the responsibility for all Central subjects. This solution eliminates dyarchy at the Centre but perpetuates it in the Provinces, and we have already indicated our reasons for rejecting it. We shall discuss these reasons more fully in the body of our Report.

(2) between Centre and Provinces:
37 The second line suggested to us is one coinciding with the line of division between the Provincial Governments and the Central Government the former being wholly responsible governments and the latter wholly irresponsible. This was the immediate (though not, as we shall suggest in a moment, the ultimate) line of division recommended by the Statutory Commission, and it is the one which we should probably have felt constrained to recommend if we had been considering a purely British Indian Federation. But it is, we think open to very serious objections which could not be fully

present to the mind of the Statutory Commission. Though it might appear at first sight to eliminate altogether the evils of dyarchy its real effect is rather to conceal dyarchy than to eliminate it. Its actual effect would be to reserve to the Governor-General the unpopular duty of taxation while allotting to responsible Provincial Ministers the agreeable task of spending the money so raised. It must be remembered that the Statutory Commission based their financial recommendations on an estimate of the future revenues of India far more sanguine than would now be accepted by any expert. They, therefore felt able to recommend the establishment of a Provincial Fund fed by automatic allocations from Central revenues which in turn would be automatically distributed among the Provinces. In a State so happily provided with ample revenues that their division between two distinct sets of public authorities could be fixed in advance by the Constitution for all time the existence of an irresponsible government at the Centre side by side with responsible governments in the Provinces might no doubt have been expected to work reasonably well. It is, however impossible for Parliament to-day to base its policy on any such assumption. The Central and Provincial Governments must as we shall show when we come to our financial recommendations, be financed from year to year largely out of the same purse. That purse, for some time to come at least, will be at best barely adequate for the needs of both, and it must, in effect, be under the sole control of the Central authorities. In these circumstances, Central policies of taxation and Central economic policies, on which the wealth of India and the volume of her public revenue will depend, must be of the most immediate and fundamental interest to the Government of every Province. A line of division which withheld this whole range of policy from the consideration of responsible Ministers could hardly fail to become the frontier across which the bitterest conflicts would be waged, and its existence would afford to Provincial Ministers a constant opportunity to disclaim responsibility for the non-fulfilment of their election promises and programmes.

38 Lastly, the line can be drawn within the Central Government itself, in such a way as to reserve the Departments of Defence and Foreign Affairs to the Governor-General, while committing all other Central subjects to the care of responsible Ministers, subject always to the special responsibilities and powers of the Governor-General outside his Reserved Departments. It is, we think, a fair conclusion from the Report of the Statutory Commission that this was the line at which they contemplated that the division of responsibility would ultimately be made. They contemplated an eventual All-India Federation. They believed that the constitution which they recommended for the Central Government would contain in itself the seeds of growth and development. It was, no doubt, for that reason, and foreseeing the course of that development, that they suggested that the protection of India's frontiers should not, at any

(3) in the Central Government

rate for a long time to come, be regarded as a function of an Indian Government in relation with an Indian Legislature at all, but as a responsibility to be assumed by the Imperial Government. Apart from the difficulties of this suggestion, to which we shall have to return in the body of our Report, it obviously involves a dyarchy of much the same kind as would result from a frank reservation to the Governor-General of the Department of Defence. In fact, the reservation of Defence, with the reservation of Foreign Affairs as intimately connected with Defence, is the line of division which corresponds most nearly with the realities of the situation. It is also the line of division which, on the whole, creates the least danger of friction. As the Statutory Commission pointed out in the passage we have already quoted, dyarchy has not, even in the Provinces, raised any insuperable difficulties "in the inner counsels of the government", and the danger of friction in the inner counsels of the Central Government will be even smaller, for the administration of Defence and Foreign Affairs will normally, at any rate, have few contacts with other fields of Central administration under the new constitution. The one real danger of friction, and that a serious one, lies in the very large proportion of Central revenues which is, and must continue to be, absorbed by the Army Budget. That Budget will be removed from the control of the Central Legislature, which will be able to discuss, but not to modify or reject it, and it may be argued with much force that the existence of a standing charge of this magnitude will deprive Ministers chosen from the Legislature of any real responsibility for the financial policy of the Federation.

39 It is true that this difficulty is inherent in the facts of the situation. It exists at the present day. Ever since the Act of 1919, the Central Legislature has constantly sought to "magnify its Budget

Legislature
and the Army

has collected round it associations which tend to obscure issues rather than to clarify them. The truth is that, in any constitution, and above all in a Federal constitution, there must be a division of responsibility at some point, and at that point there will always be a danger of friction. In framing a constitution, the problem is to draw the line at a point where these necessary evils will be minimized and the line will be drawn at different points according to the character and problems of the particular country concerned. It may be drawn at a point where the powers which are reserved from the normal operation of the constitution have, in ordinary times, little or no practical effect on the formulation and execution of policy—as, for instance, the line drawn in the British North America Act, between the powers of the Governor General and the powers of the Governor-General in Council. But in India no easy solution of this kind is possible. There the line drawn must reserve to the Governor-General large powers which will have an important effect upon the policy of the government as a whole. Broadly speaking, three possible lines of division have been suggested to us each of which deserves to be briefly discussed

(1) in the provincial sphere:

36 One is a line drawn within the sphere of the Provincial Governments in such a way as to reserve to the Provincial Governors the responsibility for the maintenance of law and order and to the Governor-General the responsibility for all Central subjects. This solution eliminates dyarchy at the Centre but perpetuates it in the Provinces, and we have already indicated our reasons for rejecting it. We shall discuss these reasons more fully in the body of our Report

(2) between Centre and Provinces:

37 The second line suggested to us is one coinciding with the line of division between the Provincial Governments and the Central Government, the former being wholly responsible governments and the latter wholly irresponsible. This was the immediate (though not, as we shall suggest in a moment, the ultimate) line of division recommended by the Statutory Commission, and it is the one which we should probably have felt constrained to recommend if we had been considering a purely British Indian Federation. But it is, we think open to very serious objections which could not be fully present to the mind of the Statutory Commission. Though it might appear at first sight to eliminate altogether the evils of dyarchy its real effect is rather to conceal dyarchy than to eliminate it. Its actual effect would be to reserve to the Governor General the unpopular duty of taxation while allotting to responsible Provincial Ministers the agreeable task of spending the money so raised. It must be remembered that the Statutory Commission based their financial recommendations on an estimate of the future revenues of India far more sanguine than would now be accepted by any expert. They, therefore felt able to recommend the establishment of a Provincial Fund, fed by automatic allocations from Central revenues which in turn would be automatically distributed among the Provinces. In a State so happily provided with ample revenues that their division between two distinct sets of public authorities could be fixed in advance by the Constitution for all time, the existence of an irresponsible government at the Centre side by side with responsible governments in the Provinces might no doubt have been expected to work reasonably well. It is however impossible for Parliament to-day to base its policy on any such assumption. The Central and Provincial Governments must functions in the reserved field of the Army Budget. The serious friction thus caused would be likely to manifest itself in an even stronger form in the future in a Central Legislature such as was proposed by the Statutory Commission—a Legislature largely representative of Provincial Legislatures yet denied all effective control over any branch of Central finance. It is also true that the Statutory Commission's own scheme for a reservation of Defence to the Imperial Parliament would raise the same difficulty in an even more acute form. It is even true that the friction which now exists over Army expenditure could hardly be intensified and might be substantially mitigated by the existence of a Ministry generally responsible to the Legislature for finance. Yet in spite of these weighty considerations, the danger of friction between the Governor-General and the Legislature over the Army Budget undoubtedly furnishes an additional argument against responsibility at the Centre in a purely British Indian Federation. But that is not the position we are now discussing. We have already made it clear that in such a Federation, we should have felt constrained to draw our line of division at another point notwithstanding the disadvantages of the alternatives to which we have drawn attention.

above. What we are now discussing is an All India Federation, and in regard to the Army Budget as in regard to the broader issues of the relations between British India and the States, the declaration of the Princes indicating their willingness to enter an All India Federation, has introduced a new and in our judgment a determining factor. It is reasonable to expect that the presence in the Central Executive and Legislature of representatives of the State Rulers who have always taken so keen an interest in all matters relating to Defence will afford a guarantee that these grave matters will be weighed and considered with a full appreciation of the issues at stake. It is indeed one of the main advantages of an All Indian Federation that it will enable Parliament to draw the line of division between responsibility and reservation at the point which on other grounds is most likely to provide a workable solution.

autonomous Provinces and an irresponsible Central
Government.

40 Before leaving this subject we ought perhaps to refer to one argument which has been urged upon us in favour of a wholly irresponsible Central Government and also to one particular danger which we think Parliament should be careful to avoid. The argument to which we refer is that an irresponsible Centre would constitute a reserve of power which could be used at any moment by the Governor-General to redress the situation in any Province if responsible government in that Province should break down. This argument seems to us to rest on a misapprehension. The Governor-General in an irresponsible Centre would have no more and no less power of intervention in the Provinces either to forestall a constitutional breakdown or to restore the situation after such a breakdown, than he would possess under our recommendations. Our recommendations do in fact reserve to him such power through the interaction of his own and the Provincial Governors' special powers and responsibilities; but in so far as his opportunities of intervention are limited they are limited not by the constitution of the Central Government but by the establishment of autonomous Provincial Governments. The danger which we think Parliament should avoid lies in the fact on which we have already insisted that Ministerial responsibility is not itself a form of government which can be created or prevented at will by the clauses of a statute.

so much as a state of relationships which tends to grow up in certain circumstances and under certain forms of government. It follows that a Constitution Act cannot legislate against Ministerial responsibility at the Centre, if its other provisions, or the facts of the case, are such as to encourage the development of such responsibility. It has been suggested to us that, while the Central Government should be declared by the Constitution to be an irresponsible Government, the Governor-General should be free to select any of his Executive Council from among the members of the Central Legislature, and that a member of the Legislature assuming Ministerial office should not be obliged to resign his seat in the Legislature. There is much to be said for such a proposal, but it is, in fact, a proposal, not for the perpetuation of an irresponsible Government, but for the gradual introduction of a responsible one. It would tend (as the Statutory Commission saw) to introduce responsible government at the Centre by insensible degrees without any statutory limitation of the scope of Ministerial power and responsibility. That is, indeed, broadly speaking, the way in which responsible government actually grew up in Canada. It may be difficult to draw any satisfactory line of division between reserved powers and responsible government, but, under the conditions of the problem that we are examining, Parliament should be careful not to draw a definite line in principle, only to blur it in practice.

11 We cannot leave this subject without asking the vital question which Parliament will have to answer: whether a Central Government of India constituted as we propose would fulfil the condition we have already laid down—whether it would provide a Central authority strong enough to maintain the unity of India and to protect all classes of her citizens. That question cannot be answered apart from a consideration of the strength or weakness of the Central Government as it now exists. As our enquiries have proceeded, we have been increasingly impressed, not by the strength of the Central Government as at present constituted, but by its weakness. It is confronted by a Legislature which can be nothing but (in Bagehot's words) "a debating society adhering to an executive." The members of that Legislature are, unrestrained by the knowledge that they themselves may be required to provide an alternative government, whose opinions are uninformed by the experience of power, and who are prone to regard support of government policy as a betrayal of the national cause. It is no wonder that the criticism offered by the members of such a Legislature should have been mainly destructive, yet it is abundantly clear from the political history of the last twelve years that criticism by the Assembly has constantly influenced the policy of Government. As a result, the prestige of the Central Government has been lowered and disharmony between Government and Legislature has tended to sap the efficiency of both. Indeed, the main problem which, in this sphere, Parliament has now to consider is how to strengthen an already weakening Central Executive. We believe that the Central Government which we recommend will be stronger than the existing Government and we see no other way in which it could be strengthened.

42 We would close this introductory part of our Report with one final word. At its outset be recorded our recognition of Indian aspirations and our sense of the weight to be attached to them. Having done so, we have examined the problem from another angle, concentrating our attention on the facts of Indian government and of Indian social conditions. Our study of these facts, has led us to 45 certain concrete conclusions which in the body of our Report we shall have further to elaborate and justify. But, having thus reached our conclusions by the exercise of our judgment on the facts of the case, we may be permitted to urge their acceptance as embodying in their broad lines, a policy on which responsible public opinion both in this country and in India may unite. We have already referred to the long process of collaboration through which successive Governments 5 in this country have sought to ascertain whether any substantial measure of agreement was possible upon the principles which should inform a new constitutional settlement in India. It can scarcely have been expected by the members of the Statutory Commission, or by the participants in the Round Table Conferences, that free and 10 unfettered discussion of issues so formidable and complex would succeed in achieving so substantial a measure of common agreement as that which has emerged in the course of the last two years. No scheme for the future government of India is of course, at present in existence which can be said to have been agreed even unofficially 15 between representatives of the two countries. Indeed we recognize that even moderate opinion in India has advocated and hoped for a simpler and more sweeping transfer of power in form if not in substance, than we have felt able to recommend. Moreover it must not be forgotten that there is a party in India with whom the prospect 20 of agreement of any kind must be remote. But, from the discussions and personal contacts of recent years, there has emerged in each country what may fairly be described as a body of central opinion which has at least reached a juster appreciation both of the difficulties 25 which impress and the motives which inspire a similar body of opinion in the other country. It is now possible to discern much common ground where previously the dividing gulf might have seemed to be unbridgeable. Not only has this movement of opinion been observable both in this country and in British India, but the Indian States also in making their contributions to recent discussions, 30 have at least indicated possibilities of agreement with His Majesty's Government and with representatives of public opinion in British India, on a new and far reaching policy of Federation which only a few years ago would have been thought to be outside the range of practical politics. On the common ground thus marked out we 35 believe that the foundations of a firm and enduring structure can be laid.

Issues with which Pa. is confronted

42A Parliament is, indeed confronted with grave problems, but it is also offered a great opportunity. There are moments in the history of nations when a way seems to be opened for the establish 40 ment between people and people of new relations more in harmony with the circumstances of the time, but when that way is beset by all the dangers inherent in any transfer of political power. Such moments are a sharp test of political sagacity of the statesman's instinct for the time and manner of the change. If that instinct 45 fails, either from rashness or from over-caution, there is small chance of recovery. In the present issue, the dangers of rashness are obvious enough. They have been urged upon us by some to whom the majestic spectacle of an Indian Empire makes so powerful an appeal that every concession appears to them almost as the betrayal of a trust, but they have been urged on us also by others whose arguments are based on the undeniable facts of the situation 5 Those arguments are for instance that no self-governing nation of the British Empire has ever been faced within its borders at one and the same time by all the problems with which India has to deal by the ever present risk of hostilities on her frontier, by the cleavage 10 between communal interests, by innumerable differences of race and speech, by a financial system largely dependent for its credit on centres outside India, and by a vast population in every stage of civilisation. Against all this, the dangers of over-caution are no less plain. No one has suggested that any retrograde step should be taken, very few that the existing state of things should be 15 maintained unaltered. The necessity for constitutional advance, at least within the limits of the Statutory Commission's report, may be regarded as common ground. We have given our reasons for believing that the constitutional arrangements which we recommend, including a measure of responsibility at the Centre, follow almost 20 inevitably from these accepted premises. If this conclusion is rejected, two consequences at least must be faced: the prospect of an All-India Federation will disappear, perhaps for ever, but certainly for many years to come, and the co-operative efforts of the last few years, together with that body of central opinion which we 25 have described, will be irretrievably destroyed.

42B These are grave issues, and if we do not enlarge further upon the consequences of a failure to make the right use of the present opportunity, it is because we believe that the choice that is now to be made must be made without fear and without favour, on a just 30 estimate of the facts of a situation and the feelings of a people, on a cool calculation of the risks involved in any of the alternative courses open to us, but without hesitations born of timidity. We have recommended the course which appears to us to be the right one, but whatever course Parliament may eventually choose, it is 35 above all necessary that its choice should be resolute and decisive.
 By general admission, the time has come for Parliament to share its power with those whom for generations it has sought to train in the arts of government, and, whatever may be the measure of the power thus to be transferred, we are confident that Parliament, in 40 consonance with its own dignity and with the traditions of the British people, will make the transfer generously and in no grudging spirit.

Paragraphs 407 to 414 are again postponed.

Paragraph 415 is again read

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock Page 229 lines 27 to 41 to leave out from (accepted) in line 27 to the end of the paragraph and to insert — (Prima facie the same considerations would apply in Burma as would apply if she were not separated from India but continued to constitute a Province of British India But it is necessary to take into account the factors which differentiate conditions in Burma from those of Provinces in India)

The further consideration of the said amendment is postponed

(415A The communal question so far as it arises from strong religious antagonisms is comparatively unimportant in Burma though Hindu Moslem conflicts are not unknown even there But its place is taken by racial rivalries between Indian and Burman Burman and Chinese, and sometimes between Karen and Burman which upon occasions have flared up into acts of violence or persecution Again serious crime—especially crimes of violence—appears to be more rife in Burma than in India In proportion to population the percentage of murders, dacoities and cattle thefts exceeds (and often greatly exceeds) the percentage in almost every other Province in British India It has been frequently necessary to adopt special measures to deal with dacoities accompanied by murder and waves of crime are apt to develop into rebellions and guerrilla warfare as was shown by the recent grave rebellion and other similar revolts in the history of the country Moreover peace has frequently been disturbed by conspiracies sometimes originating across the border led by exile pretenders claiming royal descent or by persons supposed to be reincarnated national heroes who play on the superstitions of the ignorant people All these movements, if not properly handled from the outset, may throw a countryside into disorder and panic and cause loss of life and property

The recent tendency of the Yellow Robe to encourage and stir up political animosities is a disquieting feature of recent years, for the influence of the monks is very great, especially over the women and is far more extensive than is the case in India It has also to be remembered that the agency for dealing effectively with subversive movements or incipient rebellion is almost entirely Indian and that there is a large Indian contingent in the civil police of Rangoon, in which city (population 400 000) the Burmese are outnumbered by Indians, constituting only 30 per cent. of the population of Rangoon as against 53 per cent. Indian while Chinese who have largely increased in numbers, amount to over 30,000 or 8 per cent. of the population Terrorism as an indigenous movement, is practically unknown so far as Burmans are concerned though emissaries of the Terrorist Movement are not wanting among the Bengalis in Rangoon some among whom were believed to be privy to the late rebellion We have also to consider the safety of the Indian population in the richer tracts of the Province, the Delta and Coastal Districts These men have in their hands a predominant share of the trade commerce and money lending of these areas, and in the event of any anti Indian movement among their Burman neighbours taking violent form will be in a very precarious position Taking all these special features into consideration we feel that if the department of Law and Order be transferred to the charge of a Minister it will be necessary for the Governor to be invested with the same power of resuming control as we have recommended in the case of Indian Provinces wherever Bengal terrorism has penetrated.”)

The further consideration of the said amendment is postponed

Paragraphs 416 to 418 are again postponed

Paragraph 419 is again read

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 231 lines 22 to 24, to leave out from (Provinces) in line 22 to the end of the sentence, and

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 438 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 438 is postponed

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock Page 241, after paragraph 438, to insert the following new paragraph — (" 438A. There is, however, one point of importance to which we must refer. The Statutory Commission while considering that the new Constitution of a separated Burma would, like that of India, be a stage on the journey to more complete self-government, added that it would not be assumed that detailed provisions would not vary

'In particular the provisions of the Lee Report which fixed a date by which a certain proportion of British to Indians in the Services should be reached, was based on a general average for the whole of India—greater in some Provinces, less in others. These proportions must not, therefore, be taken as automatically applicable to a separated Burma. Recruitment on a basis corresponding to the basis of All-India Services will be required and it will be of the greatest importance to preserve and build up the traditions of these Services. The pace of Burmanisation must be decided on its merits.
 The ultimate advancement of Burma will depend more than anything else on the efficiency of a suitable administration during the years now coming, and premature efforts on its part to dispense with help from Britain would only lead to disaster'

Having regard to these remarks of the Statutory Commission bearing on recruitment for the Security Services, it is not possible to ignore the fact that no Burman succeeded in entering the Indian Civil Service, before 1922, when two Burmans were nominated, whereas Indians

¹ Supra, paras 75—77, 88—96 (so far as applicable), 167 and 168

had won places in an open competition for that Service over a period extending back 65 years. The ratio of Burmanisation must depend upon qualified candidates being available in sufficient numbers, other wise the standard of the Service cannot but fall, and the higher salaries attaching to it be wasted, to the great discontent of experienced Burmese officers in the Provincial Civil Service who have been performing their duties satisfactorily on much lower pay. The table in the footnote below compares the composition of the Burma Commission on the Executive side in 1924 and 1934 respectively. The British Members of that Commission have in 10 years interval fallen from 138 to 98 while the Burmans in the I.C.S. have risen from 4 to 20. Of these, only 4 have reached 8 years of service, 6 were appointed in the current year and the remaining 10 have from 3-5 years service only.

The Burma Commission (Executive Side)

	British Officers			Burmans in the I.C.S.	Total
	Military Officers.	I.C.S.	Total.
1924	21	117	138	4	142
1934	9	87	96	20	116

The most senior Burman in the I.C.S. has 12 years' service. Only 1 out of the 20 entered by open competition in London. The decline in the strength of the Burma Commission proper has been partly compensated for by promotion, permanent and officiating, of Burman officers drawn from the Provincial Service. Having regard to the caution of the Statutory Commission and the facts which we have just described, it seems to us advisable that the Secretary of State might conveniently discuss this question further with the Government of Burma before the Constitution Act comes into force, and that the projected enquiry which is proposed in paragraph 237 in the case of the All India Services in India should not be extended to Burma until the appropriate ratio between British and Burmans in the I.C.S. and Police has been further investigated.)

The amendment, by leave of the Committee, is withdrawn.

Paragraphs 439 to 442 are again postponed.

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock. Page 242, after paragraph 442, to insert the following new paragraph:—

(442A This is a convenient point at which we may refer to questions connected with the domiciled community including Anglo-Indians and Anglo-Burmans in respect both to education and to their fitness for appointments in the various Services—the latter depending very greatly on the efficiency of the former.

Owing to the fact that the progress of English education among the Burmese was far slower than in India, Anglo-Indians are still to be found in some of the higher posts in the Provincial and Subordinate Services in Burma in the Teaching Profession in the higher clerical posts, as well as in the Central Services still under control by the Government of India. Over the whole Province the recent census shows that there are altogether 10 200 Anglo Indians, of whom just over half are concentrated in Rangoon. Hitherto their chief competitors have been Indians imported from India, and not Burmese at all, and it is obvious that any rapid drop in the number of Anglo-Indians employed in the Land Records and Excise Departments, as well as in the Present Central Services which will be transferred to the control of the Government of Burma, would inflict an unmerited blow on this community, for they would not merely lose these posts but also the means which have enabled them to pay for the education of their children. It is important, therefore, for this, among other reasons, that the standard of European education should be maintained. In India, few Indian parents wish to send their children to Christian schools for European and Anglo-Indian children but for some years past Burmese parents have shown an increasing liking for schools of this kind, and the percentage of children of other races who have been admitted into these schools has increased considerably in the last ten years. The teachers in these schools have to be paid higher salaries, and they fulfil the natural wish of European and Anglo-Indian parents that their children should be brought up in a Christian school and taught by teachers whose mother-tongue is English. If, therefore, pupils of other races and creeds should, under the new Constitution, be further increased, the whole character of these Institutions will be practically destroyed. It was represented to us that the Anglo-Indians felt that the tests imposed upon Anglo-Indian children in the matter of proficiency in Burmese tended to be too severe upon children whose mother-tongue was English, and that they were thereby prejudiced in the matter of becoming qualified for employment in the public services. These are matters in which it is not possible for us to enter upon any detail, but we consider that both the education and the employment of Anglo-Indians should engage the special attention of the Governor in order that this deserving class should not be subjected to any handicaps either in the quality of their education or their eligibility for posts in the Government service. It would further be necessary for regulations to be made laying down the percentage of appointments in railways, posts and telegraphs, and the customs' service, which could fittingly be reserved for members of the Anglo-Indian community.")

The amendment, by leave of the Committee, is withdrawn.

Paragraphs 443 to 453 are again postponed

Ordered, that the Committee be adjourned to Monday next at half-past Four o'clock.

Paragraphs 10 to 42B are again read

It is moved by the Marquess of Salisbury the Lord Middleton the Lord Rankellour Sir Reginald Craddock, and Sir Joseph Nall Pages 6 to 20g, to leave out paragraphs 10 to 42B inclusive and to insert the following new paragraphs —

(10 We have emphasized the magnitude of the British achievement in India because it is this very achievement that has created the problem which we have been commissioned by Parliament to consider. Opinions differ profoundly as to the proper solution of this problem and as to the extent to which self government should go and the conditions under which it should be approached. We would emphasize the necessity of a gradual and cautious advance. We do not underestimate the aspirations represented by the members of the Indian Delegation who assisted us, but beyond a vague spirit of unrest little more than a stiffening of Asiatic opinion against the hitherto unchallenged domination of the West, we doubt whether these Constitutional desires exist in India except amongst a small politically minded intelligentsia. Amongst these it is natural enough, being the result of a European education which this Country has given them. But education is not the same thing as experience and even this small element of the Indian population has never had the opportunity of acquiring the political experience which is our own inheritance. It was bearing in mind these circumstances that Parliament passed the Act of 1919. According to the language of the preamble of that Act the advance to self government, the ultimate objective was to be tentative and by Section 41 it was indeed provided that according as experience might teach us, that advance might proceed further or be checked or even retraced in the future. Perhaps the greatest danger in the way of this spirit of caution as all students of this problem would we think agree lies in relying upon a false analogy with Parliamentary evolution in this Country. It has even been suggested that because the form of the particular government which has been successful in conferring upon India the great benefits above described—that is the government of England—is essentially a responsible government this constitutes an argument for trusting the future of India to an Indian responsible government. This argument is wholly misleading, because the true source of these benefits was the experience and inherited capacity of the British people. Neither is it profitable to suggest that if India be denied full self-government the uninstructed mass of her people, as in certain Western nations, will attribute any lack of prosperity that the future may have in store to this denial. It would be at least as true to say that when after the granting of these reforms the Indian cultivators note the agitation which will ensue and mark the change which in greater or less degree is too likely to follow, from justice to injustice, from economy to extravagance, from efficiency to inefficiency, they may question the wisdom which has produced these results. These analogies are most unsafe. The success of our own form of government depends in the first place upon the British temperament. As Lord Bryce remarked, 'the English constitution which we admire is a masterpiece of delicate equipoises and complicated mechanism would anywhere but in England be full of difficulties and dangers. It works by a body of understanding which no writer can formulate and on habits which centuries have been needed to instil.' It could not work without this understanding, this established custom of our people, or as we should prefer to call it in this connection, their general consent. Safeguards are no doubt necessary in India, but they are in startling contrast to this general consent, and there is in reality no analogy between a government which depends upon the use of safeguards and a government which depends upon established custom. It follows, as the Statutory Commission has indicated, that our model, the Westminster model, for Indian reform should be avoided. And in particular we should be on our guard against a feature in the Westminster model, specially noted in their Report as inappropriate for India, — we mean the feature in our system "that the government is liable to be brought to an end at any moment by the vote of the legislature." For how can a Governor-General in the discharge of his reserved functions and his special responsibilities resist such a form of pressure by the legislature? There is another feature which removes the case of India poles asunder from the British model. We work with political parties. There are no such things in India. These parties in Great Britain are organised but between them there is a large unorganised mobile body of political opinion owing no allegiance to any party and therefore able by its instinctive reaction against extravagant movements on one side or the other to keep the vessel on an even keel. Not only is this mobile body absent in India but under the scheme before the Committee there would almost be an impossibility that it should be formed. With the method of indirect election, subject to the compelling force of the Communal Award, the electors will be actually prevented from being mobile and from voting for anybody outside their own creed.

"11 But let us turn from these contrasts with British experience to the teaching which even Indian experience can give us. The present dyarchic system in the Provinces, as the Commission has pointed out, though designed to develop a sense of responsibility has tended to encourage a wholly different attitude. It has been universally condemned and as will be seen in the body of our Report we are recommending its abolition in the new Provincial Constitutions. It is therefore a grave question whether we should re-create it in the Centre, involved as it must be in the reservation of the defence services to the Viceroy and outside the authority of a responsible Ministry. As the Statutory Commission pointed out it is not in the counsels of government that the practical difficulty in the way of achieving the objective of dyarchy and a clear demarcation of responsibility arise. It is the legislature which tends to be demoralised by dyarchy.

"As long as dyarchy continues, it is inevitable that the elected members of the legislature should tend to show an exaggerated hostility to the work of the reserved half of the Government, which they may interests. This danger was foreseen when we adopted indirect election : though we had no other choice. But the inter-action of indirect election upon Income Tax legislation involves another anomaly which predicates the most cautious advance in federal self-government

“ 14 These are not the only reasons why we repeat that the advance of self government should be, as the Act of 1919 intended it to be, gradual and cautious. The communal difficulty stands in the middle of the path. We are confronted with the age-old antagonism of Hindu and Mohammedan, representatives not only of two religions but of two civilisations, with numerous self-contained and exclusive minorities all a prey to anxiety for their future and profoundly suspicious of the majority and of one another and with the rigid divisions of caste, itself a denial of every democratic principle. In these circumstances though communal representation must be accepted as inevitable at the present time, it is a strange commentary on some of the democratic provisions to which we have listened. We lay stress on these facts because in truth they are in the essence of the problem and we should be doing no good service to India by glazing them over. In the face of these difficulties those upon whom responsibility will rest, whether they be in India or this Country, should have all reasonable scope for overcoming them by the method of trial and error. But for this purpose it is necessary to constitute adequate machinery for redress. For this reason we are recommending the provision of full authority in the Governor-General to give directions in all matters over which the Provincial Governors have a discretion. Undoubtedly he may be hampered in correcting Provincial mistakes by Ministers, who are supported by members representing Provincial Assemblies. That is inevitable with a Central responsible government and with indirect election of the legislature. But we think it very important to secure what power we can for the Governor-General, though we recognize that the burden thrown upon him by our proposals requires an almost unexampled degree of ability and versatility both of himself and his personal staff. Nevertheless, we are not sure that it might not be requisite to add still further to the load, and it may well be that in the new Constitution he ought to be furnished with overriding ordinance powers in the case of the Provinces, as we are proposing that he should possess in the case of the Centre, to use when necessity requires. These ordinance powers, in the case of the Centre if not in the Provinces, are certainly necessary. We agree, as has been contended, that under the present constitution the central government is unduly weak. The ordinance power would we hope serve to protect the future central power from any loss of prestige such as it is said with some truth that the present Government of India may be incurring. But what is much more to be feared in any future constitution than the loss of prestige by the Government is the loss of prestige by the Governor-General. We are not without anxiety that with a responsible government he would be exposed naked to the pressure not only of the legislature but even of his own Ministers where he differs from them, in the whole field of the reserved services, in his relations with the Princes, and in the discharge of his special responsibilities when he feels called upon to use them.

“ 15 It is necessary to add that in considering the reforms which we are about to recommend to Parliament we should find a British-India Federation to present even greater difficulties than a federation which embraces the States as well. Indeed, we believe that the feeling amongst our colleagues against a purely British-India Federal Government is overwhelming, and for these reasons. There is no question that the States have some grounds for complaining of the want of attention paid to their views by the Government of India in the past. A British-India Federal Centre would have to deal, as now, with matters intimately affecting the States without giving them any effective voice in its deliberations. If the States have reason to complain of the treatment of their interests by the present Government of India, the treatment of these by Ministers responsible to a purely British India electorate could hardly fail to lead to serious friction. Yet the very fact of this inevitable conclusion reacts upon the whole problem. We are bound to contemplate the position that would ensue if the full conditions of an All India Federal Constitution should have been enacted and thereupon the Princes, or a sufficient number of them, decline to accede. It is evident that in these circumstances the demand of the politically minded classes in British India to enter into the federation which the Princes had declined but which in all its detail would be already on the Statute book, would be very difficult to resist. This reflection adds a final reason for cautious advance in prescribing as we now proceed to do the extent of self government in India which it would be right to recommend.")

The Constitution Act should contain adequate provision to ensure reasonable facilities for the State's railway traffic and to protect its system against unfair or uneconomic competition or discrimination in the Federal Legislature. We consider that States owning and working a considerable railway system should be able to look to the arbitration machinery which we recommend for adequate protection in such matters. The same is agreed to

Paragraph 415 is again read as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 415 is postponed

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 229 after paragraph 415 to insert the following new paragraph —

(415A Terrorism of the Bengal type is we are informed practically unknown as an indigenous movement among Burmans, though the Indian population in Rangoon does we believe from time to time include emissaries of the Bengal movement and the communal question so far as it arises from strong religious antagonisms is comparatively unimportant in Burma though even there within the resident Indian community Hindu Moslem conflicts are not unknown But the place of these menaces to ordered Government is taken by racial rivalries between Indian and Burman, Burman and Chinese and sometimes between Karen and Burman, which upon occasions have flared up into acts of violence or persecution not many years ago the racial rivalry between the Burmans and the Indian community developed into a serious menace to the safety of the latter in the Delta and Coastal Districts in which richer tracts it holds an increasingly important share in commerce trade and labour supply Again serious crime—especially crimes of violence—appears to be more rife in Burma than in India In proportion to population the percentage of murders dacoities and cattle thefts exceeds (often greatly exceeds) the percentage in almost every other Province in British India It has frequently been necessary to adopt special measures to deal with large scale dacoities accompanied by murder and waves of this type of crime are apt to develop into rebellions and guerilla warfare as was shown by the recent grave rebellion and other similar revolts in the history of the country The peace of the Province has at intervals been disturbed by conspiracies sometimes originating across the border led by exile pretenders claiming royal descent or by persons supposed to be reincarnated national heroes who play on the superstitions of the ignorant people All these movements if not properly handled from the outset may throw a country aside into disorder and panic and cause loss of life and property

Nevertheless we are of opinion that the responsibility for Law and Order ought in future to rest on Ministers in Burma no less than in India and for substantially the same reasons But at the same time taking into consideration the special features which we have described of the situation in Burma we think it essential that not only should the Governor of Burma have special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to the peace and tranquillity of Burma and the powers that flow from this responsibility but also that he no less than the Governors of Indian Provinces should be invested with the statutory powers which we have recommended in their case to equip them against attempts to overthrow by violence the Government established by law

Further the conditions which we have depicted manifestly necessitate the maintenance of an efficient and highly disciplined Police Force in Burma and we are strongly of opinion that the recommendations which we have made in an earlier passage for the protection of the Police Force in Indian Provinces by protecting the statutes and rules which govern its internal organisation and discipline, should be adopted in Burma also ")

Paragraph 431 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 431 is postponed

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 241, after paragraph 438, to insert the following new paragraph —

(" 138A There is a matter of importance to which it will be convenient to refer at this point, namely, the principles on which recruitment to the Services which in Burma after separation will correspond to the All-India Services, should be based The Statutory Commission¹ when recording in general terms its views as to the Government of a separated Burma laid great stress on the importance of building up these Services in the tradition of the All-India Services which they will replace, and said 'The pace of Burmanisation must be decided on its merits' The ratios of European and Indian recruitment to the Indian Civil Service and Indian Police which were approved in 1924 on the recommendation of the Lee Commission were designed to produce an equality of Europeans and Indians (in which term Burmans are included for this purpose) for India, including Burma, regarded as a whole, by 1939 in the Indian Civil Service and by 1949 in the Indian Police The basis of calculation was an All-India average, and it has always been recognised that whereas, by the dates mentioned, there will be more Indians than Europeans in those Services, in some Provinces, in others there will be fewer Burma falls in the latter category From figures which have been laid before us showing the change in ratio in the Indian Civil Service in Burma during the last decade, it is clear that an equality of Europeans and Burmans is unlikely to be attained by 1939, nor, we are informed, is equality likely to be attained in the Indian Police in Burma by 1949. Any attempt to expedite the attainment of such equality by sacrificing the standard required of recruits would be destructive of the principle on which the Statutory Commission laid such emphasis and might will be disastrous to Burma We are of opinion that the proportion of Europeans and Burmans in the Services which in a separated Burma will take the place of the Indian Civil Service and the Indian Police will be a relevant consideration in deciding when the projected enquiry into the question of future recruitment should take place for Burma, and we wish to endorse the opinion held by the Statutory Commission in the passage cited that, in the meantime, the important thing in Burma's interests is to preserve the standard of recruitment without too close a

Paragraphs 439 to 442 are postponed

Paragraph 443 is again read

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 243 line 5 after (and) to insert (we approve them subject to the general application to the case of Burma, mutatis mutandis of the modifications which we have made in the corresponding proposals originally submitted to us in relation to India. In particular we recommend that there should be imposed on the Governor of Burma an additional special responsibility corresponding to that which¹ we have recommended should be imposed on the Governor General of India for the prevention of discriminatory or penal treatment of imports from the United Kingdom.)

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 443 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 443 is postponed.

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 243 after paragraph 443 to insert the following new paragraph —

(443A The general principle underlying the proposals submitted to us in this regard is that inasmuch as the association between India and Burma in the last 50 years has been, broadly, of a similar nature to that which has been built up over a longer period between the United Kingdom and India Indians should be afforded in Burma, generally the same measure of protection in regard to their business avocations and commercial undertakings as we have recommended for United Kingdom subjects. We think that this is right Pursuing this principle we think that the additional responsibility which, as we have mentioned in the preceding paragraph should be laid upon the Governor to protect imports into Burma from the United Kingdom from penal or discriminatory treatment should extend to the protection of imports from India into Burma And, in order that Burma should not be exposed, or feel that she is exposed by this recommendation to unequal treatment in this respect, we think that reciprocally the special responsibility with which the Governor General of India is to be charged under our recommendations should extend to the case of the products of Burma imported into India.)

Paragraphs 308 to 414 are again postponed.

Paragraph 415 is again read.

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Page 229 lines 27 to 41, to leave out from (accepted) in line 27 to the end of the paragraph and to insert (In general the same considerations apply in Burma if separated, as apply in the other Provinces of British India But there are certain special circumstances which we think it right to mention On the one hand Terrorism of the Bengal type is practically unknown among the Burman people and communal strife arising from strong religious antagonisms is rare and unimportant To this extent the problem is less difficult than in other Provinces On the other hand Burma exhibits racial rivalries which on occasion have developed into violent riots between one community and another and serious crime—especially crimes of violence—appears to be more rife in Burma than in India in proportion to population the annual record of dacoities murders and cattle thefts is very high. This no doubt is due in part to the fact that barely 50 years have elapsed since with the conquest of Upper Burma British authority was established throughout the Province and British ideas of Law and Order began to be instilled into the whole countryside To this fact and perhaps also in some degree to the Burman temperament may we think be attributed the organised resistance to authority amounting to armed rebellion and guerilla warfare which has at times, even within the past few years, affected a large number of districts and which, owing to the difficult nature of the country and the lack of good communications has proved very troublesome to put down. Nevertheless we are of opinion that the responsibility for Law and Order ought in future to rest on Ministers in Burma no less than in India and for substantially the same reasons. At the same time, bearing in mind the special features of the problem that we have described we think it essential that the Governor of Burma should have powers additional to the powers flowing from his special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to the peace and tranquillity of Burma as proposed in the Burma White Paper He like the Governors of Indian Provinces should be vested with the statutory powers which we have "recommended in their case to equip them against attempts to overthrow by violence the Government established by law. Further, conditions in Burma manifestly necessitate the maintenance of an efficient and highly disciplined police force, and we are of opinion that the recommendations which we made in an earlier passage for the protection of the police forces in Indian Provinces by protecting the statutes and rule which govern its internal organisation and discipline should be adopted in Burma also")

Paragraph 115 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 115 is postponed

Paragraphs 116 to 153 are again postponed

Paragraphs 1 to 138 are again postponed

Paragraph 139 is again read, as amended, and is as follows —

"139. We do not think that the consent of the Governor should any longer be required to the introduction of legislation which affects religion or religious rites and usages. We take this view, not because we think that the necessity for such consent might prejudice attempts to promote valuable social reforms, which has been suggested as a reason for dispensing with it, but because in our judgment legislation of this kind is above all other such as ought to be introduced on the responsibility of Indian Ministers. We have given our reasons elsewhere for holding that matters of social reform which may touch, directly or indirectly, Indian religious beliefs can only be undertaken with any prospect of success by Indian Ministers themselves, and, that being so, we think it undesirable that their responsibility in this most important field should be shared with a Governor. It has been objected that the mere introduction of legislation affecting religion or religious rites and usages might be dangerous at times of religious or communal disturbance, and might indeed itself produce such disturbance. We observe, however, a Proposal in the White Paper¹ whereby the Governor would be empowered, in any case in which he considers that a Bill introduced or proposed for introduction, or any clause thereof, or any amendment to a Bill moved or proposed, would affect the discharge of his special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquility of the Province, to direct that the Bill, clause or amendment shall not be further proceeded with. This appears to us an ample safeguard against the danger to which we have referred, and in addition it would of course always be open to the Governor, in his discretion, to refuse his assent to any Bill which has been passed by the Legislature, if in his opinion it is undesirable on any ground that it should become law. We had also thought at first that a Provincial Legislature ought not to be empowered (as they are not empowered at present) to pass a law which repeals or is repugnant to an Act of Parliament extending to British India, even though the prior consent of the Governor to its introduction in the Legislature might be required. We understand, however, that the great bulk of the existing law in India is the work of Indian legislative bodies and that there are in fact very few Acts of Parliament (apart from those relating to subjects on which it is proposed that the Legislatures shall have not power to legislate at all) which form part of the Indian statute book, and fewer still dealing with matters which will fall within the provincial sphere. In these circumstances we think that the proposal should stand but the Governor's Instrument of Instructions might perhaps direct him to reserve bills which appear to him to fall within this category

Paragraph 5 is again postponed

Paragraph 6 is read, as amended and is as follows —

The British
Achievement,

6 The record of British rule in India is well known. Though we claim for it neither infallibility nor perfection since like all systems of Government, it has at times fallen into error it is well to remember the greatness of its achievement. It has given to India that which throughout the centuries she has never possessed a Government whose authority is unquestioned in any part of the sub-Continent it has barred the way against the foreign invader and has maintained tranquillity at home it has established the rule of law and by the creation of a just administration and an upright judiciary it has secured to every subject of His Majesty in British India the right to go in peace about his daily work and to retain for his own use the fruit of his labours. The ultimate agency in achieving these results has been the power wielded by Parliament. The British element in the administrative and judicial services has always been numerically small. The total European population of British India to-day including some 60 000 British troops is only 135 000. The total British element in the Superior Services is about 3 150 and of these there are approximately 800 in the Indian Civil Service and 500 in the Indian Police.

It is moved by the Lord Middleton Line 2 to leave out ("not") and to insert (nor)

The same is agreed to

It is moved by Mr Cocks Line 5 to leave out (the) and to insert (many)

The amendment by leave of the Committee is withdrawn

It is moved by Mr Attlee Mr Cocks Mr Morgan Jones and the Lord Snell Line 10 after (right) to insert (if not the power)

The same is disagreed to

Paragraph 6 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 6 is postponed

Paragraph 7 is read, as amended, and is as follows —

“ 7 The success of British rule cannot be justly estimated without ^{The Mogul} reference to the condition of things which preceded it The arts of ^{Empire.} government and administration were not indeed unknown to the earlier
3 Hindu kings like Asoka, and the strong hand of the Mogul Emperors
4 who reigned between 1525 and 1707 maintained a State which ultimately embraced the larger part of India and did not suffer by comparison with, if it did not even surpass in splendour, the contemporary monarchies of Europe But the strength of the Mogul Empire depended essentially upon the personal qualities of its ruling House, and when the succession of great Emperors failed, its collapse inevitably followed, nor during its most magnificent period was its authority unchallenged either within or without its borders Its system of government resembled that of other Asiatic despotisms The interests of the subject races were made subservient to the ambitions, and often to the caprices, of the monarch, for the politic toleration of Akbar and his immediate successors disappeared with Aurungzeb The imperial splendour became the measure of the people's poverty, and their sufferings are said by a French observer, long resident at the Court of Aurungzeb, to have been beyond the power of words to describe ”

It is moved by Mr Cocks Lines 3 and 4, to leave out (“ the earlier Hindu kings like Asoka ”) and to insert (“ the Buddhist Emperor Asoka (264—227 B C), one of the greatest and most peace-loving rulers the world has ever seen ”)

The amendment, by leave of the Committee, is withdrawn

It is moved by The Lord Hardinge of Penshurst Line 4, to leave out (“ like Asoka ”)

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 7 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 7 is postponed

Paragraph 8 is again postponed

Paragraph 9 is again read

It is moved by Mr Cocks Page 6, lines 25 and 26, to leave out from (“ than ”) in line 25 to the end of the paragraph and to insert (“ anything she “ has ever been able to achieve in modern, as contrasted with traditional “ times ”)

The same is disagreed to

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock Page 6, line 26, after (“ history, ”) to insert (“ At the same time the surveys and settlement of the land including “ the recognition and determination by law of land tenures, and the just “ assessment of the land revenue, together with the preparation and revision “ from time to time of the record of rights and customs, have afforded “ guarantees of security to the vast agricultural population upon which has “ depended the welfare of the whole sub continent ”)

The same is agreed to

It is moved by Mr Morgan Jones, Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, and the Lord Snell Page 6, line 26, at the end to insert (“ It would be to leave one side “ of the picture unpainted, however, if we failed to point out that in spite of this educational and material progress, which we do not seek to underestimate—and in this connection it must be mentioned that at no period of its history has India, which possesses an ancient and unique literature of its own, been an altogether unenlightened country—the great mass of the population still remains in a state of extreme poverty that perhaps in no other part of the world is to be seen so sharp a contrast between the great wealth of the comparatively few and the grinding indigence of the many that the toiling peasant is still burdened by the exactions of the money lender and the often absentee landlord and that according to the Census of 1921 only 19 800 000 men and 2 800 000 women, or 122 in every 1 000 men and 18 in every 1 000 women roughly 7 per cent of the population are able to read and write)

“ 20 In establishing, or extending, parliamentary government in the Provinces, Parliament must take into account the facts of Indian life. It must give full weight, indeed, to the testimony of the Statutory Commission that, in spite of the disadvantages of dyarchy on which the Commission laid such stress, Indians have shown, since 1921, a marked capacity for the orderly conduct of Parliamentary business, a capacity which has grown steadily with the growth of their experience. We cannot doubt that this apprenticeship in Parliamentary methods has profoundly affected the whole character of Indian public life, both by widening the circle of those who have had practical contact with the affairs of government and by stimulating the growth of a public conscience amongst the educated classes as a whole. But other facts must also be frankly recognized. Parliamentary government, as it is understood in the United Kingdom, works by the interaction of four essential factors: the principle of majority rule, the willingness of the minority for the time being to accept the decisions of the majority, the existence of great political parties differing on questions of policy, but each desiring to act with public spirit and in good faith, and finally the existence of a mobile body of political opinion, owing no permanent allegiance to either Party and therefore able, by its instinctive reaction against extravagant movements on one side or the other, to keep the vessel on an even keel. In India none of these factors can be said to exist to-day. There are no parties, as we understand them, and no mobile body of political opinion. In their place we are confronted with the age-old antagonism of Hindu and Muhammedan, representatives not only of two religions but of two civilisations, with numerous self-contained and exclusive minorities, all a prey to anxiety for their future and profoundly suspicious of the majority and of one another, and with the rigid divisions of caste, itself inconsistent with democratic principle. In these circumstances, communal representation must be accepted as inevitable at the present time, but it is a strange commentary on some of the democratic professions to which we have listened. We lay stress on these facts because in truth they are of the essence of the problem and we should be doing no good service to India by glossing them over. These difficulties must be faced, not only by Parliament, but by Indians themselves. It is impossible to predict whether, or how soon, a new sense of provincial citizenship, combined with the growth of parties representing divergent economic and social interests, may prove strong enough to absorb and obliterate the religious and racial cleavages which thus dominate Indian political life. Meanwhile it must be recognised that, if free play were given to the powerful forces which would be set in motion by an unqualified system of parliamentary government, the consequences would be disastrous to India, and perhaps irreparable. In these circumstances, the successful working of parliamentary government in the Provinces must depend, in a special degree, on the extent to which Parliament can translate the customs of the British constitution into statutory “safeguards.” ”

25 Lastly there must be an authority in India armed with adequate powers, able to hold the scales evenly between conflicting interests and to protect those who have neither the influence nor the ability to protect themselves. Such an authority will be as necessary in the future as experience has proved it to be in the past. Under the new system of Provincial Autonomy it will be an authority held as it were in reserve, but those upon whom it is conferred must at all times be ready to intervene, if the responsible Ministers and the Legislatures should fail in their duty. This power of intervention must generally speaking be vested primarily in the Provincial Governors but their authority must be closely linked with and must be focussed in a similar authority vested in the

and for an impartial authority to hold scales evenly between conflicting interests.

Paragraph 38 is read, as amended and is as follows —

" 38. Lastly the line can be drawn within the Central Government itself in such a way as to reserve the Departments of Defence and Foreign Affairs to the Governor General, while committing all other central subjects to the care of responsible Ministers, subject to the

- 5 retention by the Governor-General of the special powers and responsibilities outside his Reserved Departments, similar to (though not necessarily in all respects identical with) those which we contemplate should be conferred on the Provincial Governors. The nature of the central safeguards which would in that event be necessary will be discussed like the provincial safeguards, in the body of our Report, but, subject to them the effect of drawing the line on this point would be to make Indians responsible for policy over the whole field of government.
- 11 It is we think a fair conclusion from the Report of the Statutory Commission that this was the line at which they contemplated that the division of responsibility would ultimately be made. They contemplated an eventual All India Federation. They believed that the constitution which they recommended for the Central Government would contain in itself the seeds of growth and development. It was, no doubt, for that reason and for the course of that development, that they suggested that the protection of India's frontiers should not, at any rate for a long time to come, be regarded as a function of an Indian Government in relation with an Indian Legislature at all, but as a responsibility to be assumed by the Imperial Government. Apart from the difficulties of this suggestion, to which we shall have to return in the body of our Report, it obviously involves a dyarchy of much the same kind as would result from a frank reservation to the Governor-General of the Department of Defence. In fact, the reservation of Defence, with the reservation of Foreign Affairs, is intimately connected with Defence, is the line of division which corresponds most nearly with the realities of the situation. It is also the line of division which, on the whole, creates the least danger of friction. As the Statutory Commission pointed out in the passage we have already quoted, dyarchy has not, even in the Provinces, raised any insuperable difficulties "in the inner counsels of the government", and the danger of friction in the inner counsels of the Central Government will be even smaller, for the administration of Defence and Foreign Affairs will normally, at any rate, have few contacts with other fields of Central administration under the new constitution. The one real danger of friction, and that a serious one, lies in the very large proportion of Central revenues which is, and must continue to be, absorbed by the Army Budget. That Budget will be removed from the control of the Central Legislature, which will be able to discuss, but not to modify or reject it, and it may be argued with much force that the existence of a standing charge of this magnitude will deprive Ministers chosen from the Legislature of any real responsibility for the financial policy of the Federation."

“ 39 It is true that this difficulty is inherent in the facts of the situation. It exists at the present day Ever since the Act of 1919 the Central Legislature has constantly sought to magnify its functions in the reserved field of the Army Budget. The serious friction thus caused would be likely to manifest itself in an even stronger form in the future in a Central Legislature such as was proposed by the Statutory Commission—a Legislature largely representative of Provincial Legislatures, yet denied all effective control over any branch of Central finance. It is also true that the Statutory Commission's own scheme for a reservation of Defence to the Imperial Parliament would raise the same difficulty in an even more acute form It is even true that the friction which now exists over Army expenditure could hardly be intensified and might be substantially mitigated by the existence of a Ministry generally responsible to the Legislature for finance. The existence of a large standing charge for Defence does not lessen the financial responsibility of Ministers. Far the greater part of most national budgets are, in effect, unalterable because they are the results of commitments arising out of the past in the field of foreign relations or of social reform The margin of discretion which is available to Ministers anywhere in increasing or reducing taxation or altering expenditure is usually small and this margin in India, will be within the control of Ministers, subject to the Governor-General's special responsibility in the financial sphere. Ministers will naturally wish to save money on defence in order that they may spend it on 'nation building' departments under their own charge. But in point of fact the cost of Indian defence, though a large proportion of the Central budget, is, compared with the whole of the resources of India, central and

- 28 provincial, considerably less than the cost of defence in some other 29 countries containing a smaller population than that of India. We believe that responsible Indian Ministers will be not less anxious for adequate defence than the Governor-General and will usually, after discussion with him, support his view of what is necessary and will be able to convince their following in the legislature that it is sound. Yet in spite of these weighty considerations, the danger of friction between the Governor-General and the Legislature over the Army Budget undoubtedly furnishes an additional argument against responsibility at the Centre in a purely British India Federation. But that is not the proposition we are now discussing. We have already made it clear that, in such a Federation, we should have felt constrained to draw our line of division at another point, notwithstanding the disadvantages of the alternatives to which we have drawn attention above. What we are now discussing is an All-India Federation, and in regard to the Army Budget, as in regard to the broader issues of the relations between British India and the States, the declaration of the Princes, indicating their willingness to enter an All-India Federation, has introduced a new and, in our judgment, a determining factor. It is reasonable to expect that the presence in the Central Executive and Legislature of 18 representatives of the State Rulers who have always taken so keen an interest in all matters relating to Defence will afford a guarantee that these grave matters will be weighed and considered with a full appreciation of the issues at stake. It is, indeed, one of the main advantages of an All-India Federation that it will enable Parliament to draw the line of division between responsibility and reservation at the point which, on other grounds, is most likely to provide a workable solution."

Paragraph 76 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 76 is postponed

Paragraphs 77 and 78 are again postponed

Paragraph 79 is read as amended, and is as follows —

"79 With regard to (A) It is apparent that the close connection between the Governor's responsibilities within the administered districts of his Province and the responsibilities of the Governor General exercised through the person of the Governor in his other capacity as Agent General for the Tribal Tracts on the borders of the Province makes a provision of this kind necessary With regard to (i) we agree that this special responsibility is necessary in the case of Sind in view of the vital influence upon the future finances of the Province of the successful operation of the Sukkur irrigation scheme and of the large financial interest which the Central Government has in it

But in our opinion the two proposals in the White Paper which have reference to special circumstances in particular Provinces do not exhaust the requirements of this kind It has come to our notice that, under the system of joint administration of the Districts known as the Berars with the Central Provinces which has obtained for many years and which, as we have already pointed out¹ will continue under the new Constitution, there has been a tendency on the part of the inhabitants of the Berais, and of their representatives in the Legislature, to criticise the apportionment between the two areas forming the joint Province as favouring unduly the Central Provinces area to the disadvantage of the Berars. We express no opinion as to the justification for such criticisms, but it is evident that, under a system of responsible government, the scope for grievances on this account may well be increased. We think, therefore, that the Governor of the joint Province should have imposed upon him a special responsibility and should thus be enabled to counteract any proposals of his Ministry which he regards as likely to give justifiable ground for complaint on this account. Without attempting to usurp the functions of the draftsman, we suggest that the purpose we have in view would be adequately expressed in defining the special responsibility in some such terms as —

“ We think, moreover, that the Governor might appropriately be directed in his Instrument of Instructions to constitute some impartial body to advise him on the principles which should be followed in the distribution of revenues if he is not satisfied that past practice affords an adequate guide for his Ministers and himself for the discharge of the special responsibility imposed upon him in respect of them

We also think that the special position of the Berars should be recognised by requiring the Governor, through his Instrument of Instructions, to interpret his special responsibility for “ the protection of the rights of any Indian State ” as involving inter alia an obligation upon him, in the administration of the Berais, to have due regard to the commercial and economic interests of the State of Hyderabad ”

Paragraph 79A is read, as amended, and is as follows —

“ 79A We think it desirable to make some reference to the suggestion that among the special responsibilities of the Governor should be included the safeguarding of the financial stability and credit of the Province following the analogy of the special responsibility of this kind which, as we shall explain later, we recommend should be imposed on the Governor-General in relation to the Federation¹. A similar proposal was examined and rejected by the Statutory Commission² on the ground that a power of intervention over so wide a field would hinder the growth of responsibility. We agree with this view. The other special responsibilities which we recommend will give the Governor adequate powers in relation to supply and taxation to ensure that then due discharge is not impeded by lack of financial resources, we refer specially to one aspect of this matter below³. But the addition of a special financial responsibility would increase enormously the range of his special powers. There is no real parallel with the situation at the Centre where there is paramount necessity to avoid action which might prejudice the credit of India as a whole in the money markets of the world and where so considerable a proportion of the revenues are needed for the expenditure of the reserved departments.⁴ The Statutory Commission point out⁵ that the Central Government, through their powers of control over Provincial Borrowing, should be able to exercise a salutary influence over Provinces. We also attach importance to this method of checking improvidence on the part of a Province, and as we explain below⁶ we approve subject to one modification the proposals in the White Paper for the regulation of provincial borrowing.

83 We have considered various suggestions to meet this difficulty (1) that the Governor should be empowered if he thought fit, to appoint a Minister from outside the Legislature the Minister so appointed having precisely the same status as other Ministers and sharing their policy and political fortunes with the right to take part in all proceedings of the Legislature, though not entitled to vote (2) that in addition to the elected members, there should be one or two members nominated by the Governor who would be eligible for appointment as Ministers, though not necessarily so appointed (3) that the Governor should be empowered if he desired to have an outside Minister to nominate the person whom he selected as a member ad hoc of the Legislature and (4) that the Ministers themselves should be empowered

⁴ Infra para. 10

⁵ Infra para. 462.

25 it so requested by the Governor, to co-opt someone from outside and present him to the Governor for appointment. We can see no advantage, and many disadvantages, in the second and third of these suggestions, and the fourth is open to the grave objection that it would infringe the Governor's prerogative. The only plan, therefore, which, in our opinion, merits consideration is the first. We have, however, come to the conclusion that such advantages as might be anticipated from a provision in the Constitution Act enabling the Governor to appoint to his Ministry one or more persons who are not members of the Legislature would weigh little in the balance against the dislike and suspicion with which such a provision would undoubtedly be viewed almost universally in India—a dislike and suspicion so strong that we think it unlikely that any Governor would, in fact, find it possible to exercise such a power. We recommend, therefore, that the proposal in the White Paper to which we have alluded¹ should remain unchanged."

Paragraph 87 is read as amended, and is as follows —

2 "87 We find ourselves unable to conceive a government to which the quality of responsibility could be attributed, if it had no responsibility for order. In no other sphere has the word "responsibility" so profound and significant a meaning, and nothing will afford Indians the opportunity of demonstrating more conclusively their fitness to govern themselves than their action in this sphere. From one point of view indeed the transfer of those functions to an Indian Minister may be in the interest of the police themselves whom it will no longer be possible to attack as they have been attacked in the past as agents of oppression acting on behalf of an alien power but we prefer to base our conclusion upon the broader grounds indicated above. Nevertheless it must not be supposed that we are blind to the risks implicit in the course which we advocate for those in our opinion cannot be regarded lightly or as the phantoms of a reactionary imagination. The qualities most essential in a police force discipline impartiality and confidence in its officers are precisely those which would be most quickly undermined by any suspicion of political influence or pressure exercised from above and it would indeed be disastrous if in any Province the police force to whose constancy and discipline in most difficult circumstances India owes a debt not easily to be repaid were to be sacrificed to the exigencies of a party or to appease the political supporters of a Minister. If therefore the transfer is to be made as we think it should, it is essential that the Force should be protected so far as possible against those risks, and in the following paragraphs we make recommendations designed to secure this protection.

Control of law and order an essential attribute of responsible government.

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 87 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 87 is postponed

Paragraph 88 is read as amended, and is as follows —

88 First there are the proposals already made in the White Paper. The Governor is to have a special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of the Province or any part thereof. The effect of this as of all other special responsibilities is to enable the Governor if he thinks that the due discharge of his special responsibility so requires to reject any proposals of his Ministers or himself to initiate action which his Ministers decline to take. Further there flows from this special responsibility not only the right to overrule his Ministers but also special powers—legislative and financial—to enable him to carry into execution any course of action which requires legislative provision or the revision of supply. If therefore the Governor should be of opinion that the action or inaction of Ministers is jeopardising the peace or tranquillity of the Province it will be his duty to take action to meet the situation. If the situation is one requiring immediate action he will issue any executive order which he may consider necessary. If the situation is one which cannot be dealt with by an isolated executive order—if the Minister in charge of the Department appears unable to administer his charge on lines which the Governor regards as consistent with the due discharge of his special responsibility—the Governor will dissolve and replace the Minister (and if necessary the Ministers as a body with or without resort to a dissolution of the Legislature). If he fails to find an alternative Government capable of administering Law and Order on lines consistent with the discharge of his special responsibility he will be obliged to declare a breakdown of the constitution, and to assume to himself all such powers as he judges requisite to retrieve the situation. We are not contemplating such a course of events as probable but if it occurs provision is made to meet it.

- "89. We turn now to our own further recommendations for the specific protection of the Police Force itself. Of course, the due discharge of his special responsibility for peace and tranquillity will, in itself, entitle the Governor to interview immediately if, by reason of ill-timed measures of economy or the attempted exertion of political influence on the Police Force or from any other cause, the morale or the efficiency of that Force is endangered. Further, the Governor has another special responsibility: it is his duty to secure to the members of the Police, as of other Public Services, any rights provided for them by the Constitution Act and to safeguard their legitimate interests. These are important safeguards, but there is a special factor in police administration which requires to be specially protected. We refer to the body of Regulations known as the "Police Rules", promulgated from time to time under powers given by the various Police Acts. A large number of the Rules deal with matters of quite minor importance and are constantly amended, in practice, on the responsibility of the Inspector-General of Police himself. It would be unnecessary to require the Governor's consent to every amendment of this kind. But the subject matter of some of the Rules is so vital to the well-being of the Police Force that they ought not, in our opinion, to be amended without the Governor's consent, and the same consideration applies a fortiori to the Acts themselves, which form the statutory basis of the Rules. Our aim should be to ensure that the internal organisation and discipline of the Police continue to be regulated by the Inspector-General, and to protect both him and the Ministers themselves from political pressure in this vital field. We, therefore, recommend that the consent of the Governor, given in his discretion, should be required to any legislation which would amend or repeal the General Police Act in force in the Province or any other Police Acts (such as the Bombay City Police Act, the Calcutta Police Act, the Madras City Police Act, and Acts regulating Military Police in Provinces where such forces exist). We further recommend that any requirement in any of these Acts that Rules made under them shall be made or approved by the local Government is to be construed as involving the consent of the Governor, given in his discretion, to the making or amendment of any Rules, which, in his opinion, relate to, or affect, the organisation or discipline of the Police."

Paragraphs 90 and 91 are again postponed.

Paragraph 92 is read as amended and is as follows —

Special powers
required for combating terrorism.

92. But even so the circumstances set out above render it imperative to arm the Governor with powers which will ensure that the measures taken to deal with terrorism and other activities of revolutionary conspirators are not less efficient and unhesitating than they have been in the past. We are indeed, particularly anxious not to absolve Indian Ministers, in Bengal or elsewhere, from the responsibility for combating terrorism, and we think that such executive duty should be clearly laid upon them. But the issues at stake are so important and the consequences of inaction, or even of half hearted action for even a short period of time, may be so disastrous, that the Governor of any Province must, in our opinion have a special power over and above his special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to peace and tranquillity to take into his own hands the discharge of this duty even from the outset of the new Constitution. This purpose would not be adequately served by placing the Special Branch of the Provincial Police alone in the personal charge of the Governor. That course has been urged upon us, but we are convinced that it falls short of what is required. Instead we recommend that the Constitution Act should specifically empower the Governor at his discretion, if he regards the peace and tranquillity of the Province as endangered by the activities, overt or secret, of persons committing or conspiring to commit crimes of violence intended to overthrow the Government by law established, and if he considers that the situation cannot otherwise be effectively handled, to assume charge, to such extent as he may judge requisite of any branch of the government which he thinks it necessary to employ to combat such activities, or if necessary to create new machinery for the purpose. If the Governor exercises this power he should be further authorized at his discretion to appoint an official as a temporary member of the Legislature, to act as his mouthpiece in that body and any official so appointed should have the same powers and rights, other than the right to vote, as an elected member. The powers which we have just described would be discretionary powers, and the Governor would therefore be subject to the superintendence and control of the Governor-General and ultimately of the Secretary of State, in all matters connected with them. We should add that if conditions in Bengal at the time of the inauguration of Provincial Autonomy have not materially improved it would in our judgment, be essential that the Governor of that Province should exercise the powers we have just described forthwith and should be directed to do so in his Instrument of Instructions which in this as in other respects, would remain in force until amended with the consent of Parliament. 1 20 assigned to one of the Governor General's Reserved Departments as part of its normal activities and that the change in the form 17 of government, whether at the Centre or in the Provinces, should not involve any change in the relationship which at present exists between the Central Bureau and the provincial Intelligence Departments. Should the Governor-General find that the information at his disposal whether received through the channel of the Governors or from the provincial Intelligence Departments through the Central Intelligence Bureau is inadequate, he will, in virtue of recommendations which we make later² possess complete authority to secure through the Governor the correction of any deficiencies, and indeed to point out to the Governor, and require him to set right any shortcomings which he may have noticed in the organisation or activities of the provincial Intelligence Branch.

Paragiaph 99 is again postponed

Paragiaph 101 is read, as amended, and is as follows —

101 We observe that the White Paper proposes that whereas temporary Ordinances, if extended beyond six months, are to be laid before Parliament,¹ there is no similar proposal in the case of Governor's Acts. We consider that all Governor's Acts should be laid before Parliament and that the Governor before legislating should have the concurrence of the Governor-General.

The further consideration of paragiaph 101 is postponed

Paragiaph 102 is read, as amended, and is as follows —

102 The next special power which it is proposed to give the Governor is the power (for use in emergencies) of issuing temporary Ordinances, to be valid for not more than six months in the first instance, but renewable once for a similar period. At the present time, this power is only exercisable whether for a single Province or for the whole of British India by the Governor-General, but we cannot doubt that in an autonomous Province it should in future be vested in the Governor himself. It was urged by the British India Delegation that the power should continue to be vested in the Governor-General, and we agree that his concurrence should be obtained.

The further consideration of paragraph 109 is postponed.

Paragraph 107 is again read as amended, and is as follows —

107 In the preceding paragraphs we have approved the proposal of the White Paper to entrust certain wide discretionary powers to the Governor and we have recommended that, in certain respects, those powers should be strengthened and extended. We should not wish to pass from this subject without some general review of the broad considerations which have led us to these conclusions. The dominant consideration is the one which we have already emphasised the vital importance in India of a strong Executive. It has seemed to us in the course of our discussions with the British India delegates that in their anxiety to increase the prerogatives of the Legislature, they have been apt to overlook the functions of the Executive, an attitude not perhaps authority of the latter and to weaken the sense of responsibility offers the main field of political activity. But if the responsibility for government is henceforward to be borne by Indians themselves they will do well to remember that to magnify the Legislature at the expense of the Executive is to diminish the authority of the latter and to weaken the sense of responsibility of both. The function of the executive is to govern and to administer, that of the Legislature to vote supply to criticize to educate public opinion, and to legislate and great mischief may result from attempts by the latter to invade the executive sphere. The belief that parliamentary government is incompatible with a strong Executive is no doubt responsible for the distrust with which parliamentary institutions have come to be regarded in many parts of the world. The United Kingdom affords a sufficient proof that a strong Executive may co-exist even with an omnipotent Parliament if the necessary conditions are present, and the strength of the Executive in this country may, we think, be attributed with not more justice to the support of a disciplined party than to the inveterate and cherished tradition of Parliament 29 that the prerogatives of the Legislature are not jealously or factiously asserted in such a way as to prevent the King's Government from being called on. 'His Majesty's Opposition' is not an idle phrase, but embodies a constitutional doctrine of great significance."

² Infra paragraphs 20-22. See also supra paragraph 92A.

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 107 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 107 is postponed

Paragraph 108 is again read, and is as follows —

6 "108 It is a commonplace that this tradition is as yet unknown in India and that Indian Ministries have not hitherto been able to rely on the support of a disciplined party. The Statutory Commission, in surveying the work of the existing Provincial Constitution, observed that Governors, in choosing their Ministers have had an exceptionally difficult task. It could seldom be predicted what following a Minister would have in the Legislature, quite apart from the fact that his acceptance of office was often followed, owing to personal rivalries, by the detachment of some of his previous adherents. It has been urged upon us by the members of the British-India Delegation that these difficulties will tend to disappear under responsible government. We hope that it will be so, and neither we nor the Statutory Commission would have recommended that the experiment should be made if we were not satisfied that under no other system can Indians come to appreciate the value of the tradition of which we have spoken. But it must be remembered that in two respects the difficulties of Provincial Ministries in the future may be greater than in the past. In the first place, they will not in future be able to rely upon the official bloc which, in the words of the Statutory Commission 'has helped to decrease the instability of the balance of existing groups in the Legislature and has made the tenure of office of Ministers far less precarious'

22 In the second place, each Ministry will, as we have already pointed

23 out, be a composite one. The Legislatures will be based on a system of communal representation, and the Governor will be directed by his Instrument of Instructions to include in his Ministry, so far as possible, members of important minority communities. A Ministry thus formed must tend to be the representative, not, as in the United Kingdom, of a single majority

28 Party or even of a coalition of Parties, but of minorities as such

29 Moreover, the system of communal representation may also tend to render less effective the weapon to which, under most parliamentary constitutions, the executive resorts when confronted by an obstructive legislature, the weapon of dissolution, for under such a system even a general election may well produce a legislature with the same complexion as its predecessor."

"121A We have given careful consideration in this connexion to the number of seats to be allotted to special interests and in particular Special interests seats to representations submitted to us in favour of a substantial increase in the number of seats to be allotted to Labour in the new Provincial Legislatures. An material alteration in the number of seats allotted to special interests would inevitably involve a reopening of the Com-7 munal Award, and we have indicated above the objections to this.
 But we are in any case of opinion that the representation proposed in the White Paper for landlords, commerce and industry, universities and labour, may be regarded as striking a just balance between the claims of the various interests, and as affording an adequate representation for them. We observe in particular that the representation of labour has been increased from 9 seats in the present Provincial Legislative Councils to a total of 38, the present marked difference between the representation of labour and of commerce and industry being thus very substantially reduced. Having regard to this, to the large number of seats set aside for the Depressed Classes (whose representatives will to some extent at any rate represent labour interests), and to the extension of the franchise, which will bring on the electoral roll large numbers of the poorer and of the labouring classes, we are of opinion that the position of labour, the importance of which we fully recognise, is adequately safeguarded under the pro-22 posals embodied in the White Paper."

It is moved by the Lord Snell, Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, and Mr Morgan Jones Lines 7 to 22, to leave out from ("this") in line 7 to

 "is proposed in the White Paper to allot 56 of these special seats to "Commerce and Industry, 37 to Landholders, and 38 to Labour, a "total of 131, and bearing in mind the view of the Indian Franchise "Committee that 'if special constituencies are retained, it should be "'recognised that Labour has not less claim to representation than "'employers' we are of the opinion that at least half of these seats "should be given to Labour. We therefore recommend that the re'presentation of Labour should be increased to 66 seats, which would "still leave 65 special seats for Landholders and Commerce and Composition of Second

 Chambers.

192. The Communal Award did not extend to the Legislative Council of any Province. The composition of these Councils which is set out in the White Paper is however based upon the same principles as the Communal Award but, since the Legislative Councils are much smaller bodies than the Legislative Assemblies and it would be impossible therefore to provide in them for the exact equivalent of all the interests represented in the Lower House, it is proposed to include a certain number of seats to be filled by nomination to be filled by the Governor at his discretion and accordingly available for the purpose of redressing any possible inequality. We think that this is a reasonable arrangement, and we have included provision for it in the detailed recommendations which are set out in the Appendix above referred to. We think that the Legislative Council should not be dissoluble but that one-third of its members should retire at fixed intervals. 8 10 14

We are informed that the proposals have the general support of the Government of India and of the Provincial Governments. The basis of the franchise proposed is essentially, as at present, a property qualification (that is to say, payment of land revenue or of rent in towns, tenancy, or assessment to income tax), to which are added an educational qualification and certain special qualifications designed to secure an adequate representation of women and to enfranchise approximately 10 per cent of the Depressed Classes (called in Appendix V Scheduled Castes) by the enfranchisement of retired, pensioned and discharged officers, non-commissioned officers and men of His Majesty's Regular Forces, and by the provision of a special electorate for the seats reserved for special interests, such as labour, landlords and commerce. The individual qualifications vary according to the circumstances of the different Provinces but the general effect of the proposals is to enfranchise approximately the same classes and categories of the population in all Provinces alike."

Paragraph 129 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 129 is postponed.

Paragraph 129 is read as amended, and is as follows —

129 We have carefully examined a suggestion to substitute for direct election in territorial constituencies an indirect system of election by means of local groups. At first sight an arrangement of this nature would appear to have the advantage of widening the basis of the franchise of giving an equal vote at the primary stage to every adult of facilitating voting by the primary elector and of securing a more experienced and intelligent secondary

- elector, and having regard to these considerations, we felt it our duty, despite the fact that discussion and experiment in India had led the Indian Franchise Committee to reject it, again to consider its practicability. The effect of the evidence given before us by witnesses of great experience has however been to show that, superficially attractive as a system of group election may be, the objections to it in existing conditions in India are decisive. We have been especially impressed by the administrative difficulties involved in constituting electoral groups, given the existence of caste and the reality of the communal problem, and by the argument that faction runs so high in many Indian villages that group elections would inevitably become highly contested and that it would be necessary to provide for them all the machinery of an ordinary election. We were informed not only that conditions in the villages had changed so materially of late that the circumstances which some six or seven years ago made it justifiable to put forward a proposal for the use of the group system no longer existed, but that there was
- 21 no real support for the introduction of such a system either from public or from official opinion in India. In the light of our further investigation of this question we are satisfied that in the case of the Provincial Legislatures the balance of advantage at the present moment clearly lies in retaining the system of direct election. We do not, however, desire to be understood as reporting against the introduction of some system of indirect election in the future. The considerations which we have advanced against its adoption at the present moment may lose much of their force as social conditions change, and as institutions of local self-government develop in the Provinces. The problem is essentially one which Indians must consider for themselves, and on which we feel sure that Parliament will be ready to listen with the utmost attention
- 36 to any recommendations which may be made to it by Provincial Legislatures."

This allusion may furnish an opportunity of saying that though this subject did not come directly within the scope of our enquiry we are fully conscious of its great importance. Indeed, the progress of self-government in the Provinces of India will depend on the growth not only of responsible Governments at the top, but also of local self-governing institutions from the bottom—from the village community or panchayat upwards. It is thus that the great mass of the India peasantry, constituting a vast majority of the people, whose welfare has been constantly in our minds during the whole course of our discussions can be trained in those qualities of responsible citizenship which may hereafter entitle them to the full Provincial franchise. These are matters upon which Indians must form their own conclusions, but we venture to express the hope that they will, from the first, give full attention to them")

There is a further point in connection with the disqualification of candidates which may conveniently be mentioned here Proposal 81 of the White Paper recites the disqualifications to be prescribed for the membership of a Provincial Legislature. Among these are included conviction for the offence of corrupt practices or other election offences, and in the case of a legal practitioner, suspension from practice by order of a competent court. We observe, however, that in the election rules under the Montagu Reforms, as well as in the Morley-Minto Reforms before them, the conviction of a person of certain criminal offences was a disqualification for the membership of the Legislature. On this particular point the rule ran as follows —

'A person against whom a conviction by a Criminal Court involving a sentence of transportation or imprisonment for a period of more than one year is subsisting shall, unless the offence of which he was convicted has been pardoned, not be eligible for election for five years from the date of expiration of the sentence

'Provided that on application made by a person disqualified the Local Government with the previous approval of the Governor-General in Council may remove the disqualification'

"We are not clear why this rule, which has the sanction of nearly 25 years' usage behind it, should have been eliminated from the disqualifications contained in Proposal 84 of the White Paper, and we recommend its retention")

The Earl of Lytton did not vote.

The said amendment is agreed to

Paragraphs 137 and 138 are again postponed

Paragraph 139 is read, as amended and is as follows —

139 We do not think that the consent of the Governor should any longer be required to the introduction of legislation which affe to religion or religious rites and usages. We take this view not because we think that in practice the necessity for such consent might prejudice attempts to promote valuable social reforms which has been suggested as a reason for dispensing with it, but because in our judgment legislation of this kind is above all other such as ought to be introduced on the responsibility of Indian Ministers. We have given our reasons elsewhere for holding that matters of social reform which may touch, directly or indirectly Indian religious beliefs can only be undertaken with any prospect of success by Indian Ministers themselves and, that being so we think it undesirable that their responsibility in this most important field should be shared with a Governor. It has been objected that the mere introduction of legislation affecting religion or religious rites and usages might be dangerous at times of religious or communal disturbance and might indeed itself produce such disturbance. We observe however a Proposal in the White Paper³ whereby the Governor would be empowered, in any case in which he considers that a Bill introduced or proposed for introduction or any clause thereof or any amendment to a Bill moved or proposed, would affect the discharge of his special responsibility for the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of the Province, to direct that the Bill clause or amendment shall not be further proceeded with. This appears to us an ample safeguard against the danger to which we have referred and in addition it would of course always be open to the Governor in his discretion to refuse his assent to any Bill which has been passed by the Legislature if in his opinion it is undesirable on any ground that it should become law. We had also thought at first that a Provincial Legislature ought not to be empowered (as they are not empowered at present) to pass a law which repeals or is repugnant to an Act of Parliament extending to British India, even though the prior consent of the Governor to its introduction in the Legislature might be required. We understand, however that the great bulk of the existing law of India is the work of Indian legislative bodies and that there are in fact very few Acts of Parliament (apart from those relating to subjects on which it is proposed that the Legislatures shall have no power to legislate at all) which form part of the Indian statute book and fewer still dealing with matters which will fall within the provincial sphere. In these circumstances we think that the proposal should stand, but the Governor's Instrument of Instructions might perhaps direct him to reserve bills which appear to him to fall within this category."

It is moved by the Lord Rankeillom Lines 13 to 28, to leave out from ("Governor") in line 13 to ("We") in line 28 and to insert ("In saying this, however, we must guard ourselves against the implication that the Governor's special responsibility for the protection of the legitimate interests of minorities does not extend to legislation as well as administration. On the contrary it will clearly be his duty to protect all minorities from unjust proposals in the Legislature. In the case of measures introduced by ministers we understand that it is intended that he shall have the power of directing the withdrawal or amendment of any Bill, and we think that this power should be made explicit in the Constitution Act. In the case of other Bills it will be open to him by formal Message or otherwise to intimate that he will be unable to give his assent to the proposals either in any form or without amendment and we note that it is already provided that he may stop the progress of any Bill which is of so provocative a nature as to involve his other special responsibility for the peace and tranquillity of the Province. We should add that suitable machinery should be devised to ensure that complaints of minorities shall be brought to the notice of the Governor") The amendment, by leave of the Committee, is withdrawn

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Line 13, after ("has") to insert ("been represented to us that the removal of the safeguard of the Governor's previous sanction may operate to the disadvantage of small minorities such as the Indian Christians who would not be in a position to make effective their objections to legislation which they regarded as prejudicial. But we do not think that the recommendation we have just made is, in fact, open to this criticism. The Governor could always prevent the introduction or secure the withdrawal of any legislative proposal by his Ministers which he regarded as inconsistent with the discharge of his special responsibility for the protection of minorities, and he would, in addition, be free, as indicated in the next paragraph, to refuse his assent to any Bill which had been passed by the Legislature if, in his opinion, it were undesirable on any ground that it should become law. It would also be open to him to intimate to the Legislature by Message or otherwise the attitude which he felt bound to take to any proposal under discussion, to the extent even of making it clear that he would be unable to accord his assent to the proposal if the Legislature were to pass it. We entirely concur that the Governor should possess such a power, but we think that his Instrument of Instructions should make quite clear the purpose for which it is designed namely, that it is not primarily intended as a safeguard against the passing into law of a measure which the Governor considered dangerous to peace and tranquillity. For this purpose the safeguard is the power of withholding assent")

Paragraph 141 is read as amended and is as follows —

141 It is proposed that the powers of a Provincial Legislature shall not extend to any part of the Province which is declared to be an Excluded Area or a Partially Excluded Area." In relation to the former the Governor will himself direct and control the administration in the case of the latter he is declared to have a special responsibility. In neither case will any Act of the Provincial Legislature apply to the Area unless by direction of the Governor given at his discretion with any exceptions or modifications which he may think fit. The Governor will also be empowered at his discretion to make regulations having the force of law for the peace and good government of any Excluded or Partially Excluded Area, but subject in this case to the prior consent of the Governor General. We have already expressed our approval of the principle of Excluded Areas, and we accept the above proposals as both necessary and reasonable, so far as the Excluded Areas proper are concerned. We think, however that a distinction might well be drawn in this respect between Excluded Areas and Partially Excluded Areas and that the application of Acts to or the framing of Regulations for Partially Excluded Areas is an operation which might appropriately be performed by the Governor acting on the advice of his Ministers the decisions taken in each case being of course subject to the Governor's special responsibility for Excluded Areas, that is to say being subject to his right to differ from the proposals of his Ministers if he thinks fit voluntary act.

150A. The rights, authority and jurisdiction which will thus be conferred by the Crown on the new Central Government will not extend to any Indian State. It follows that the accession of an Indian State to the Federation cannot take place otherwise than by the voluntary act of its Ruler. The Constitution Act cannot itself make any Indian State a member of the Federation. It will only prescribe a method whereby the State may accede and the legal consequences which will flow from the accession. There can be no question of compulsion so far as the States are concerned. Their Rulers can enter or stand aside from the Federation as they think fit. They have announced their willingness to consider federation with the Provinces of British India on certain terms but whereas the powers of the new Central Government in relation to the Provinces will cover a wide field and will be identical in the case of each Province the Princes have intimated that they are not prepared to agree to the exercise by a Federal Government for the purpose of the Federation of a similar range of powers in relation to themselves.

Paragraph 174 is read, as amended and is as follows —

essential.

174. It may be assumed that in practice the willing co-operation of the other departments of Government will render unnecessary any recourse to these special powers and we should view with dismay the prospects of any new Constitution, if the relations between the ministerial and the reserved Departments were conducted in an atmosphere of jealousy or antagonism. The influence of the Governor-General will no doubt always be exerted to secure co-ordination and harmony but it may well be that some permanent co-ordinating machinery will be desirable. The British India Joint Memorandum suggests a statutory Committee of Indian Defence constituted on the lines of the Committee of Imperial Defence but we are not sure that its authors fully appreciate the position and functions of the latter since it is not a statutory body and its value is perhaps increased by the elasticity of its constitution. We are disposed to think that a body with statutory powers and duties might embarrass the Governor-General and even be tempted to encroach upon his functions. An advisory body similar to the Committee of Imperial Defence, constituted at the Governor-General's discretion would not be open to that criticism and might, we think have many advantages. It has been urged upon us that, in order to build up an informed opinion upon Defence questions, a statutory Committee of the Legislature should be established. We understand that, outside the formal opportunities of discussing Defence questions on such occasions as the Defence Budget opportunities are already given to members of the Legislature to inform themselves upon Army questions and provided that the extent and methods of consultation are clearly understood to rest in the discretion of the Governor General we see no objection to the formation of any Committee or Committees that the Federal Government and Legislature may consider useful. We feel however that this is essentially a question to be settled by the Legislature and not by the Constitution Act.

"175A In illustration of the principle that the Governor-General should invite the collaboration of the Federal Ministry to the widest extent compatible with the preservation of his own responsibility, we would refer to the question of lending Indian personnel of the Defence forces for service outside India. There have been many occasions on which the Government of India have found themselves able to spare contingents for operations overseas in which considerations of Indian defence have not been involved, and we may presume that such occasions will recur. There appears to be some misconception in India on this point, which it would be desirable to remove. It is not the case that, because a Government can in particular circumstances afford a temporary reduction of this kind in its standing forces, the size of those forces is thereby proved to be excessive or conversely, that if it is not excessive troops cannot be spared for service elsewhere. These standing forces are in the nature of an insurance against perils which may not always be insistent but which nevertheless must be provided for. There is thus no ground for assuming a prima facie objection to the loan of contingents on particular occasions. If on such occasions the Governor-General is asked whether he can lend a contingent, he must decide, first, whether the occasion involves the defence of India in the widest sense, and secondly whether he can spare the troops having regard to all the circumstances at the time. Both these decisions would fall within the exclusive sphere of his responsibility. If he decided that troops could be spared, the only remaining constitutional issue would be narrowed down to one of broad principle, namely, that Indian leaders as represented in the Federal Ministry should be consulted before their fellow-countrymen were exposed to the risks of operations in a cause that was not their own. In view, however, of the complexities that may arise, we do not feel able to recommend that the ultimate authority of the Governor-General should be limited in this matter. Our proposal is that when the question arises of lending Indian personnel of the Defence Forces for service outside India on occasions which in the Governor-General's decision do not involve the defence of India in the broadest sense, he should not agree to lend such personnel without consultation with the Federal Ministry. We have little doubt that in practice he will give the greatest weight to the advice of the Federal Ministry before reaching his final decision. The financial aspect has also to be considered. Although in the circumstances we are discussing the defence of India would not be involved, it might on occasions be in India's general interests to make a contribution towards the cost of external operations. A proposal in the White Paper¹ reproduces the provision of s 20 (1) of the Government of India Act that "the revenues of India shall be applied for the purposes

Employment of Indian & 4 troops outside

of the government of India alone' and a contribution in the general interests of India would come within the scope of that provision. Under the new Constitution however the recognition of interests of this nature would fall within the province of the Federal Ministry and Legislature, since ex hypothesi they would not be defence interests. If, therefore, the question should arise of offering a contribution from India's revenues in the circumstances we are discussing (and the interests in question did not fall under the other reserved department of External Affairs) we are of opinion that it would need to be ratified by the Federal Legislature.

It is moved by Mr Morgan Jones, Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, and the Lord Snell. Lines 27 to 30 to leave out from (own) in line 27 to (Our') in line 30, and to insert ('We think that this should be done and we have little doubt that in practice the Governor General will give the greatest weight to the advice of the Ministry before taking his final decision.)

It is moved by Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell Page 96, after paragraph 189, to insert the following new paragraphs —

("190 In fact we go further and we suggest that any attempt to create at the Centre an exact reproduction of the machinery which functions at Westminster would be doomed to failure. In this country the system of responsible government depends on stable divisions on Party lines and, generally speaking, functions most satisfactorily when there are only two main Parties. These parties are not the creation of groups formed by members of the legislature subsequent to their election, but represent real divisions of opinion which extend back to the constituencies. In the Federal legislature, which we are now discussing, apart from the communal cleavages which already make the working of the Westminster system difficult in many provinces, there will be two distinct categories of members, the elected representatives from British India and the nominees of the Rulers of States. It seems difficult, therefore, to envisage the emergence of Parties on lines familiar to this country. Two further obstacles present themselves. The first is that, owing to the nature of the Federation, the members of the legislature, will not be equally concerned in its territory, and that the jurisdiction of the Federation will not extend as to all subjects equally over that territory. The second is that the subject-matter of Central administration and legislation provides a somewhat slender basis for a full parliamentary system. Ninety per cent. of everything that concerns the ordinary citizen will come within the ambit of Provincial administration. For these reasons we believe that responsibility at the Centre will be developed on lines very different from those at Westminster. It is not perhaps, always realised in India that the British Cabinet is in fact the master of the legislature. This is a result of the Party system for the Cabinet, although formally chosen by the Crown is in fact composed of the leading members of the Party in a majority. It maintains its control largely through the discipline of the Party machine backed by the power of Dissolution. We do not think that this power of the Ministry to control the Legislature will be reproduced at Delhi: indeed we think it probable that the Ministry will be far more the servant than the master of the legislature: in other words the members of the legislature will have to take full responsibility for their actions, and we do not think that the practice, whereby a ministry is dependent from day to day on the Vote of the Legislature will be workable in India. We, therefore suggest certain proposals for giving—what is essential—greater stability to the administration.

191 The Federal Executive in our view should consist of the Governor-General, the Counsellor in charge of Defence and Ministers, the number of whom we think it undesirable to specify. We consider that when the Legislature has been constituted the Governor-General should consult with leading members in order to find out what combination of persons would be likely to command the confidence of the legislature. He should then submit three Ministers and the Counsellor in charge of Defence as a Ministry to the Legislature for a Vote of Confidence. If this vote is carried the Ministry should remain in office for a definite term during which period it could only be removed by a definite Vote of No Confidence carried by a two-thirds majority. As already stated the position of the Ministry will be something like that of the Swiss Executive. Formal joint responsibility will not be explicitly laid down, as indeed it is not in most constitutions, but the actions of the Government would be the actions of all its members, and although the Ministry would be composed of heterogeneous elements it would be subjected to those powerful influences which tend to create solidarity in any body of persons holding positions of responsibility. We think that in the early stages of the working of the new Constitution the Governor-General will preside at meetings of his Cabinet and that only as time goes on will this practice fall into oesuetude. There should, however be a First Minister who will preside in the absence of the Governor-General and lead in the Legislature. He should hold a portfolio without too heavy an administrative content. For the working of the Legislative machine we suggest the setting up of a number of standing committees, some of which Defence, Finance, Foreign Affairs, should be statutory. These committees should correspond with the functions of the Central Government. They would meet from time to time during the Session. The Minister should preside, while in the case of the Committee of Defence, the official Member would do so. We conceive of these committees working somewhat on the lines of those of municipal bodies or in the Ceylon Constitution. The object should be to bring the members of the Legislature into real contact with administration. We think that the Committee stage of a Bill should wherever possible be remitted to the standing committee dealing with the particular function of government concerned. We think that in this way through a developed committee system, much of the difficulty which has been brought to our notice of State Members voting on purely British India questions would be avoided as it would be natural to remit Bills dealing solely with British India to committees of members drawn only from British India. The Defence Committee would have less power of control than would be possessed by the other committees, but in spite of this would, we think form a valuable field of experience for members. We consider that at all these committees it should be the usual practice for officials to be present, not for influencing policy, but for providing information. In our view, owing to the subject-matter which would be dealt with at the Centre and to the position of the Federation, it is unlikely that governments will be formed with definite legislative programmes, as in this country. We think that much legislation will come forward in the way of private members' Bills. We have made this general sketch of the way in which we might expect responsibility to be exercised at the Centre, because it is important to realize that the British system is not the only possible system and that it itself is susceptible of reform in some directions. It is a question as to what provisions can be included in the Constitution Act itself. We would prefer to leave the development of the Constitution at the Centre to the elected Members to work out the forms and methods which seem appropriate. We attach importance, however, to the provision which will give to the Ministry some degree of stability, for we have seen in many countries where there has been no stable Party system in Legislatures, but only a number of groups, the danger and weakness entailed by constant changes of Ministry, and we should desire that at the Centre, from the start, it should not be assumed that because the Legislature takes a different view from the Ministry on a particular point that therefore the Ministry should resign. It is for this reason that we have suggested that changes of Ministry should only take place as the result of a direct Vote of No Confidence carried by a two-thirds majority.")

The same are disagreed to

Paragraph 194 is read, as amended, and is as follows —

- "194 There is no part of the subject of our enquiry which has seemed to us to present greater difficulties than the question of the method of election to a Central Legislature for India. It is one on which there has always been a marked difference of opinion, and we recall that the Joint Select Committee which considered the Government of India Bill in 1919 did not accept the recommendations of the Southborough Committee which had been embodied in the Bill, and that there is a similar divergence between the recommendations of the Statutory Commission and the proposals in the White Paper. It should be recognized that to attempt to provide a legislative body which shall be representative of a population of over 350 millions is without precedent. We are met at the outset by the difficulty of applying the representative system on a basis of direct representation to a unit of such magnitude. On the one hand, if the constituencies were of a reasonable size the resultant Chamber would be unmanageably large, if, on the other hand, the Chamber were of a reasonable size the constituencies on which it was based would necessarily be enormous. In these circumstances our task has been an anxious one, and we have only arrived at our conclusions after a careful and prolonged examination of the matter in all its aspects."

Paragraph 199 is read as amended and is as follows —

199. Direct election has the support of Indian opinion and is strongly advocated by the British India Delegation in their Joint Memorandum. It has been the system in India for the last twelve years, and has worked on the whole reasonably well, though, it should be remembered with a much more limited franchise than that now proposed. The Southborough Committee which visited India in 1919 for the purpose of settling the composition of and the method of election to the Legislatures set up by the Government of India Bill of that year did it is true, recommend the indirect system but the Joint Select Committee which examined the Bill were of a contrary view and Parliament accepted the opinion of the Committee. It may also be argued that, with the increase in the size of the Legislatures now proposed it will be possible to effect so appreciable a reduction in the size of the existing constituencies as to diminish the objections based on that feature of the present system. But even the reduction in the size of constituencies which would follow from the White Paper proposals will still leave them unwieldy and unmanageable, unless the number of seats is increased beyond all reasonable limits. Where a single constituency may be greater in extent than the whole of Wales, a candidate for election could not in any event commend or even present his views to the whole body of electors, even if the means of communication were not, as in India, difficult and often non-existent and quite apart from obstacles presented by differences in language and a widespread illiteracy nor could a member after election hope to guide or inform opinion in his constituency

Direct or

These difficulties would be serious enough with the comparatively limited franchise proposed in the White Paper, but future extensions of that franchise would be inevitable, and it is obvious that with every increase in the electorate these difficulties are enhanced. Indeed, any considerable extension of the franchise under a system of direct election would cause an inevitable breakdown. We do not believe that constituencies both of large size and containing an electorate of between 200,000 and 300,000 people can be made the basis of a healthy parliamentary system. We think that Parliament and Indian public opinion should face these facts and should recognise that direct election, apart from its immediate merits or demerits at the present time, cannot provide a sound basis for Indian constitutional development in the future. We cannot believe that it would be wise to commit India at the outset of her constitutional development to a line which must prove to be blind alley."

It is moved by Mr Cocks, Mr Moigar Jones, and the Lord Snell Lines 15 to 39, to leave out from ("system") in line 15 to the end of the paragraph and to insert ("Bearing in mind the strength of Indian opinion in this matter we have come to the conclusion, notwithstanding the objections which can be urged against it, that there is no alternative to the adoption of a system of direct election")

Paragraph 202A is read, as amended, and is as follows —

"202A We feel strongly, however, that it is not possible for indirect Parliament to lay down to-day the exact method of constituting election to be the Central Legislature for any long period of time. The question regarded in the nature of an experiment. has been repeatedly examined, before the passage of the present Government of India Act, by the Statutory Commission, and by the Round Table Conferences and the Indian Franchise Committee in connection with the present proposals for reform. Throughout this whole period opinions have been deeply divided and no clear cut solution has emerged as indeed was to be expected when an attempt is being made to create a Federation on a scale and of a character hitherto without precedent. We have chosen the system of indirect election by the Provincial Legislatures not because we do not feel the force of the arguments which can be brought against it, but because we think that it is the arrangement which will give the most practical system at the outset of the Federation. Moreover while it will be possible in future to pass from the indirect to the direct system of election should experience show that step to be advisable, the maintenance and still more the extension of the system of direct election to-day would be to commit India to a system which logically leads to adult suffrage before any way has been discovered of overcoming the insuperable objections to the gigantic constituencies containing hundreds of thousands of voters which are inevitable with adult franchise in India under the ordinary system of direct election. We feel that the ultimate solution may well be found in some variant either of the system whereby groups of primary voters elect secondary electors, who vote directly for members of the federal assembly or of the system whereby those already elected to local bodies, such as village panchayats, are the voters who vote directly for members of that assembly. Systems of this kind apparently work with considerable success in many countries where conditions are not dissimilar to those in India. But the discovery of the best method of adapting these ideas to India's needs and of removing the obstacles which now stand in the way of their adoption is clearly one which should be made by Indians themselves in the light of their experience of the practical working of representative institutions under the new Constitution. We consider therefore, that our proposals should be regarded as being in the nature of an experiment and that further consideration should be given to the question of the method of composing the Central Legislature in the light of practical working of the Constitution. We do not propose that there should be any formal examination of the problem by a Statutory Commission after any specific date for we think that experience has shown that there are strong objections to automatic provisions of this kind. But we consider that Parliament should recognize that after sufficient time has elapsed to enable clear judgments to be formed of the way in which the Constitution works and of the new political forces it has brought into being, it may be necessary to make amendments in the method of composing the Central Legislature, and we hope that if Indian opinion thinks modification is required the Federal Legislature will lay its own proposals before Parliament in the form recommended elsewhere¹ in this report.

Paragraph 216 is read, as amended, and is as follows —

"216 The question was much discussed before us whether any special provision ought to be included in the Constitution Act prohibiting States' representatives from voting on matters of exclusively British-India concern. The British-India Delegation in their Joint Memorandum urge that this should be done, and their suggestions are briefly as follows —(1) that in a division on a matter concerning solely a British-India subject, the States' representatives should not be entitled to vote, (2) that the question whether a matter relates solely to a British-India subject or not should be left to the decision of the Speaker of the House, which should be final, but (3) that if a substantive vote of no confidence is proposed on a matter relating solely to a British-India subject, the States' representatives should be entitled to vote, since the decision might vitally affect the position of a Ministry formed on a basis of collective responsibility, (4) that if the Ministry is defeated on a subject of exclusively British-India interest, it should not necessarily resign. We do not think that these suggestions would in any way meet the case. Circumstances may make any vote of a Legislature, even on a matter intrinsically unimportant,

an unmistakable vote of no confidence the distinction between formal votes of no confidence and other votes is an artificial and conventional one and it would be impossible to base any statutory enactment upon it. On the other hand the States have made it clear that they have no desire to interfere in matters of exclusively British India concern nor could we suppose that it would be in their interests to do so but they are anxious, for reasons which we appreciate that their representatives should not be prevented by any rigid statutory provisions from exercising their own judgment from supporting a Ministry with whose general policy they are fully in agreement or from withholding their support from a Ministry whose policy they disapprove. In these circumstances we think that the true solution is that there should be no such prohibition but that the matter should be regulated by the common sense of both sides and by the growth of constitutional practice and usage, and indeed we have no doubt that both parties will find it in their mutual interest to come to some suitable working arrangement at an early stage. We have however one suggestion to make which we think may be worth consideration. Under the Standing Orders of the House of Commons all Bills which relate exclusively to Scotland and have been committed to a Standing Committee are referred to a Committee consisting of all the members representing the Scottish constituencies, together with not less than ten nor more than fifteen other members. We think that a provision on these lines might very possibly be found useful and that the Constitution Act might require that any Bill on a subject included in List III should if extending only to British India, be referred to a Committee consisting either of all the British India representatives or a specified number of them, to whom two or three States' representatives could, if it should be thought desirable be added.

The further consideration of paragraph 216 is postponed.

Paragraph 217 is read, as amended and is as follows —

217 The transformation of British India from a unitary into a Federal State necessitates a complete readjustment of the relations between the Federal and Provincial Governments. The Provincial Governments are at the present time subordinate to the Central Government and under a statutory obligation to obey its orders and directions though the Central Government and indeed the Secretary of State himself is bound by statutory rules not to interfere with the provincial administration save for certain limited purposes in matters which under the devolution rules now fall within the transferred provincial sphere. But now that the respective spheres of the Central and of the Provinces will in future be strictly delimited and the jurisdiction of each (except in the concurrent field which we have described elsewhere) will exclude the jurisdiction of the other a nexus of a new kind must be established between the Federation and its constituent units. We are impressed by the possible dangers of a too strict adherence to the principles of what is known as Provincial Autonomy. The Statutory Commission in their recommendations for Provincial Autonomy were, we think, not unaffected by the desire to give the largest possible ambit to autonomy in the provincial sphere owing to their inability at that time to recommend responsibility at the Centre. The larger measure of Indian self-government which has obtained in the Provinces during the past twelve years has also, we think, tended to develop and perhaps overdevelop a desire for complete freedom of control from the Centre. We have discussed elsewhere in our Report both the legislative and the financial nexus which the White Paper proposes to create, and we confine our observations here to the administrative relations between the Federal Government as such on the one hand and the Provincial Governments and the Rulers of Governments of the Indian States on the other."

"219 We are of opinion that the proposals in the White Paper on this subject require modification in two directions. In the first place, the White Paper draws no distinction between the execution of Federal Acts with respect to subjects on which the Federal Legislature is alone competent to legislate (List I) and the execution of Federal Acts in the concurrent field (List III). It is evident that in its exclusive field the Federal Government ought to have power to give directions—detailed and specific if need be—to a Provincial Government as proposed in the White Paper. But it is much more doubtful whether it should have such power in the concurrent field. The objects of legislation in this field will be predominantly matters of provincial concern, and the agency by which such legislation will be administered will be almost exclusively a provincial agency. The Federal Legislature will be generally used as an instrument of legislation in this field merely from considerations of practical convenience and, if this procedure were to carry with it automatically an extension of the scope of federal administration, the Provinces might feel that they were exposed to dangerous encroachment. On the other hand, the considerations of practical convenience which would prompt the use of the Federal Legislature in this field will often be the need for securing uniformity in matters of social legislation and uniformity of legislation will be useless if there is no means of enforcing reasonable uniformity of administration. We think the solution is to be found in drawing a distinction between subjects in the Concurrent List which on the one hand relate broadly speaking, to matters of social and economic legislation, and those which on the other hand relate mainly to matters of law and order and personal rights and status. The latter from the larger class and the enforcement of legislation on these subjects would, for the most part, be in the hands of the Courts or of the provincial authorities responsible for public prosecutions. There can hardly be no question of Federal directions being issued to the Courts."

Distinction between legislation in the exclusive and concurrent fields nor could such directions properly be issued to prosecuting authorities in the Provinces. In those matters, therefore, we think that the Federal Government should have in law as they could have in practice, no powers of administrative control. The other class of concurrent subjects consists mainly of the regulation of mines, factories, employers liability and workmen's compensation, trade unions, welfare of labour, industrial disputes, infectious diseases, electricity and cinematograph films. In respect of this class, we think that the Federal Government should, where necessary have the power to issue general directions for the enforcement of the law but only to the extent provided by the Federal Act in question. 39

 We think that the Federal Government should, where necessary have the Federal Legislature it is improbable that a body so representative of provincial opinion will sanction any unreasonable encroachment upon the provincial field of action; but, as a further safeguard against such encroachment we think that any clause in a statute conferring such powers should require the previous sanction of the Governor General.

It is moved by the Marquess of Louthgow Line 9 after (Paper) to insert (The same principle should apply to matters in which action or inaction by a provincial Government within its own exclusive sphere affects the administration of an exclusively Federal Subject—that is to say it should be open to the Federal Government to give directions to a provincial Government which is so carrying on the administration of a Provincial Subject as to affect prejudicially the efficiency of a Federal Subject.)

Paragraph 223 is read as amended and is as follows —

223. We do not observe any proposals in the White Paper dealing with disputes or differences between one Province and another other than disputes involving legal issues for the determination of which the Federal Court is the obvious and necessary forum. Yet it cannot be supposed that inter provincial disputes will never arise, and we have considered whether it would not be desirable to provide some constitutional machinery for disposing of them. At the present time the Governor-General in Council has the power to decide questions arising between two Provinces in cases where the Provinces concerned fail to arrive at an agreement, in relation to both transferred and reserved subjects, but plainly it would be impossible to vest such a power in the Governor-General or Federal Ministry after the establishment of Provincial Autonomy, though we do not doubt that the good offices of both will always be available for the purpose. But after careful consideration we have come to the conclusion that it would be unwise to include in the new Constitution any permanent machinery for the settlement of disputes of the sort which we have in mind, and in our opinion the more prudent course will be to leave the Provinces free to develop such supplementary machinery as the future course of events may show to be desirable. There will be necessarily many subjects on which inter-provincial consultation will be necessary, as indeed has proved to be the case even at the present time, and we consider that every effort should be made to develop a system of inter-Provincial conferences, at which administrative problems common to adjacent areas as well as points of difference may be discussed and adjusted. Suggestions for a formal Inter-Provincial Council have been made to us, and we draw attention in later paragraphs of our Report¹ to a number of matters on which it is, in our view, important that the Provinces should co-ordinate their policy, in addition to the financial problem which we discuss hereafter.² It is obvious that, if departments or institutions of co-ordination and research are to be maintained at the Centre in such matters as agriculture, forestry, irrigation, education, and public health, and if such institutions are to be able to rely on appropriations of public funds sufficient to enable them to carry on their work, the joint interest of the Provincial Governments in them must be expressed in some regular and recognised machinery of inter-Governmental consultation. Moreover, we think that it will be of vital importance to establish some such machinery at the very outset of the working of the new constitution, since it is precisely at that moment that institutions of this kind may be in most danger of falling between two stools through failing to enlist the active interest either of the Federal or the Provincial Governments, both of whom will have many other more immediate pre-occupations. There is, however, much to be said for the view that, though some such machinery may be established at the outset, it cannot be expected to take its final form at that time, and that Indian opinion will be better able to form a considered Judgment as to the final form which it should take after some experience in the working of the new constitution. For this reason we doubt whether it would be desirable to fix the constitution of an inter-Provincial Council by statutory provisions in the Constitution Act, but we feel strongly the desirability of taking definite action on the lines we have suggested as soon as the Provincial Autonomy provisions of the Constitution come into operation. We think further that, although the Constitution Act should not itself prescribe the machinery for this purpose, it should empower His Majesty's Government to regulate the working of such co-ordinating machinery as it may have been found desirable to establish, in order that at the appropriate time means may thus be available for placing these matters upon a more formal basis."

It is moved by Mr Attlee, Mr Cocks, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell After paragraph 238A to insert the following new paragraph —

(“238B It is proposed in the White Paper that such subjects as Health Insurance and Invalid and Old Age Pensions should be subjects of Provincial Legislation We see serious objection to this, and consider that they should be included in the Concurrent List While it is necessary that the more industrialized Provinces should be able to legislate on these subjects in the interests of the urban workers and should not have to wait for the concurrence of those which are predominantly rural, it is undesirable to exclude the possibility of All-India legislation which may well become necessary in order that there should be uniformity of treatment of the workers as between Province and Province and that industry in one Province should not be burdened with obligations not imposed in another Mr N M Joshi, in the Memorandum submitted by him, argued that social insurance should also be included in the list of Federal subjects, but here, again, we consider it would be better that it should be in the concurrent list

'260A. It will be convenient to refer here to the power which the States already possess to impose customs duties on their land Frontiers. It is greatly to be desired that States adhering to the Federation should, like the Provinces, accept the principle of internal freedom for trade in India and that the Federal Government alone should have the power to impose tariffs and other restrictions on trade. Many States however derive substantial revenues from customs duties at their frontiers on goods entering the State from other parts of India. These duties are usually referred to as internal customs duties but in many of the smaller States are often more akin to octroi and terminal taxes than to customs. In some of the larger States the right to impose these duties is specifically limited by treaty. We recognise that it is impossible to deprive States of revenue upon which they depend for balancing their budgets and that they must be free to alter existing rates of duty to suit varying conditions. But internal customs barriers are in principle inconsistent with the freedom of interchange of a fully developed federation and we are strongly of the opinion that every effort should be made to substitute other forms of taxation for these internal customs. The charge must, of course be left to the discretion of the States concerned as alternative sources of revenue become available. We have no reason for thinking that the States contemplate any enlargement of the general scope of their tariffs and we do not believe that it would be in their interest to enlarge it. But in any case we consider that the accession of a State to the Federation should imply its acceptance of the principle that it will not set up a barrier to free interchange so formidable as to constitute a threat to the future of the Federation and if there should be any danger of this, we think that the powers entrusted to the Governor General in his discretion would have to be brought to bear upon the States.'

"279A In addition to these rights and safeguards common to all members of the Public Services, it is proposed that, after the commencement of the Act, the Secretary of State, who will continue to make appointments to the Indian Civil Service, the Indian Police and the Ecclesiastical Department, shall regulate the conditions of service of all persons so appointed, and it is intended that the conditions of service thus laid down shall in substance be the same as at present. The power to regulate the conditions of service of officers not appointed by the Secretary of State, on the other hand, has, since 1926, been delegated to the Government of India in the case of the Central Services and to Provincial Governments in the case of Provincial Services, and the White Paper contains no provisions as to the conditions of service to be applied to officers of these Services appointed after the commencement of the Constitution Act "

The same is agreed to

Paragraphs 280 and 282 are again postponed

It is moved by the Marquess of Linlithgow Page 161, after paragraph 282, to insert the following new paragraph —

("282A It is proposed that, after the commencement of the Act, the Secretary of State, who will continue to make appointments to the Indian Civil Service, the Indian Police and the Ecclesiastical Department shall regulate the conditions of service of all persons so appointed, and it is intended that the conditions of service thus laid down shall in substance be the same as at present. The power to regulate the conditions of service of officers not appointed by the Secretary of State on the other hand, has, since 1920 been delegated to the Government of India in the case of the Central Services and to Provincial Governments in the case of Provincial Services, and the White Paper contains no provision as to the conditions of service to be applied to officers of these Services appointed after the commencement of the Constitution Act.")

The same is agreed to.

New paragraph 282A is again read.

The further consideration of paragraph 282A is postponed.

Paragraphs 283 to 283B are again postponed.

Paragraph 283C is read, as amended, and is as follows —

States and rights of central and Provincial Services not to be inferior to those All-India
Services.

(283C But, further than this it will in our view be essential that the Central and Provincial Legislatures respectively should give general legal sanction to the status and rights of the Central and Provincial Services. The special responsibility of the Governor General and Governors would of course in any case extend to securing the legitimate interests as well as the rights of members of these Services but it is on all grounds desirable that the Executive Government as a whole should be authorised and required by law to give these Services the necessary security. The principal existing rights of members of these Services are set out in List II of Appendix VII of the White Paper. We think that the Legislatures in passing Provincial Civil Service Acts authorising and requiring the Executive Government to give these Services, the necessary security would be well advised to consider whether to meet the new conditions, List II of Appendix VII of the White Paper should be enlarged by appropriate additions from List I of the same Appendix wherein are set out the principal existing rights of officers appointed by the Secretary of State. In our view the status and rights of the Central and Provincial Services should not be in substance inferior to the status and rights of persons appointed by the Secretary of State in regard to the two main points covered by List I. These two points are firstly protection against individual injury amounting to breach of contract and against individual unfair treatment through disciplinary action or refusal of promotion and, secondly protection against such arbitrary alterations in the organisation of the Services themselves as might damage the professional prospects of their members generally. On the first point, these Provincial Civil Service Acts could not, indeed, determine in detail the rates of pay allowances and pensions, and the conditions of retirement of all civil servants nor the procedure to be followed in considering their promotion on the one hand, or on the other their dismissal, removal, reduction or formal censure. Such Acts could however confer general powers and duties for these purposes on the Government and in regard to promotions, they could provide definitely that canvassing for promotion or appointments shall disqualify the candidate and that orders of posting or promotion in the higher grades shall require the personal concurrence of the Governor. On the second point, it is admittedly more difficult to give security to the Services as a whole in respect of their general organisation yet the morale of any Service must largely depend upon reasonable prospects of promotion and this must mean that there is a recognised cadre of higher paid posts which while naturally subject to modification in changing circumstances will not be subject to violent and arbitrary disturbance. A Legislature does nothing derogatory to its own rights and powers if it confers upon the Executive by law the duty of fixing such cadres and of reporting to the Legislature if any post in these cadres is at any time held in abeyance)

It is moved by Mr Cocks, Mr Attlee, Mr Morgan Jones, and the Lord Snell Lines 10 to 13, to leave out from ("Paper ") in line 10, to the end of the paragraph and to insert ("The continuance in full of these rights is "secured under the White Paper proposals")

Paragraph 305 is again read, as amended, and is as follows —

"305 In so far as the apprehension may be that a temporary deficiency in the cash required to meet such current obligations as the issue of monthly pay might occur, not through any failure in the annual revenues, but through excessive commitments in other directions, the good sense of the Government, and the advice of a strong Finance Department, must in our opinion be relied on as the real safeguard. Nor must it be forgotten that, although a Governor will not have a special responsibility for safeguarding the financial stability and credit of the Province, it will most certainly be his duty to see that he has information furnished to him which would enable him to secure such financial provision as may be required for the discharge of his other special responsibilities, including of course his special responsibility for safeguarding the legitimate interests of the Services. If need arose for the Governor to take special steps for the purpose, in virtue of his special responsibilities, it would of course, be open to him to adopt whatever means were most appropriate in the circumstances, and, if necessary, to meet the situation by borrowing. The powers available to him personally in this respect would be identical with those available to the provincial Government. If he should seek assistance from the Federal Government in the form of a loan, his application would be governed by the provision relating to provincial borrowing which we have already advocated."

No special provision required

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 305 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 305 is postponed.

Paragraph 306 is again read as amended, and is as follows —

Claims for pensions by officers appointed by the Secretary
of State.

306. We have said that no distinction can, or ought to be drawn between the claim of the various classes of officers serving in a Province for the due payment of their emoluments, but to this general statement of principle we think that there should be one qualification. If difficulties should unfortunately arise in regard to a claim to pension by an officer appointed by the Secretary of State who has served from time to time in different Provinces we think that it would be unreasonable that he should have to make his claim against a number of authorities in respect of different portions of his pension. We therefore approve the proposal in the White Paper that the claims of all officers appointed by the Secretary of State for their pensions should be against the Federal Government direct the necessary adjustments being made subsequently between the Federal Government in the Province or Provinces concerned¹ and, if that recommendation is adopted, we think that officers appointed by the Secretary of State need have no anxiety regarding the regular and punctual payment of their own pensions and those of their dependents. Existing rights of suit against the Secretary of State will be preserved 16

It is moved by Sir Reginald Craddock. Line 16 after (dependents) to insert (Pensions of retired officers, if appointed before the commencement of the Constitution Act, and the pensions of their dependents will be exempt from Indian taxation if the pensioner is residing permanently outside India. The pensions of officers appointed by the Secretary of State or by the Crown after that date and the pensions of their dependents will also be exempt from Indian taxation if the pensioner is residing permanently outside India)

The same is agreed to

Paragraph 306 is again read, as amended

The further consideration of paragraph 306 is postponed.

It is moved by the Lord Eustace Percy Page 170 after paragraph 306 to insert the following new paragraph —

(306A We should not however wish to leave this subject without making a general statement in regard to the pensions of these officers. These pensions like the pensions of all retired members of the Public Services of India are a charge upon the revenues of India, and there can be no more binding obligation resting upon the Government of India than to meet this charge in full and ungrudgingly. But though we do not doubt that it will be so met the obligation rests not only upon the Government of India to meet it, but also upon His Majesty's Government to see that it is so met. His Majesty's Government have in fact, pledged the revenues of India for this purpose and it is their duty to see that that pledge is made effective. The Governor General must therefore be armed with full powers to meet the liabilities thus secured upon the revenues of India and our approval of the proposals of the White Paper is based on the understanding that the Constitution Act will in fact, arm him with such powers)

The same is agreed to.

New paragraph 306A is again read.

The further consideration of paragraph 306A is postponed.

Paragraph 307 is again read, as amended, and is as follows —

“ 307 There is, however, one category of pension payments which stands apart from the rest, namely, the pensions payable to families of officers, civil and military, the cost of which is met not from the revenues of India but from funds accumulated by means of subscriptions paid by the officers themselves. These accumulated funds are in equity the property of the subscribers, and we think it right that the fullest possible consideration should be given to their views as to the disposal of the money. A full account of the nature of the Funds and of the steps taken to ascertain the views of subscribers is given in a Note by the Secretary of State for India which is printed in the Committee's Records. The Note also contains in some detail proposals for meeting the subscribers' wishes. We recommend that His Majesty's Government should take action on the lines indicated in this Note ”

It is moved by the Lord Hardinge of Penshurst Lines 5 to 8, to leave out from (“themselves”) in line 5 to (“V”) in line 8 and to insert (“These accumulated funds are in equity the property of the subscribers of which the British Government are, from the nature of the history of the case, quasi-trustees, and constitute an equitable charge on the revenues of the Government of India. We think it right that the fullest possible consideration should be given to the views of the contributors as to the disposal of their money.”)

Paragraph 316 is again read as amended.

The further consideration of paragraph 316 is postponed.

Paragraph 317 is again read as amended and is as follows —

317 The Supreme Court under the White Paper proposals would however as we have said have jurisdiction to hear certain criminal appeals from British India. We are satisfied that these would be so numerous that, if the Federal Court were given the extended jurisdiction which we have suggested an increase in the number of Judges would be required in excess of anything which we should be willing to contemplate. The question then arises whether the Federal Legislature should be empowered, if and when they thought fit, to set up a separate Court of Criminal Appeal for British India, subordinate to the Federal Court. After careful consideration we have come to the conclusion that a Court of Criminal Appeal is not required in India. Nearly every case involving a death sentence is tried in a District Court from which an appeal lies to the High Court, and, apart from this, no death sentence can be carried out until it has been confirmed by the High Court. Only three of the High Courts (excluding Rangoon) exercise an original criminal jurisdiction and though there is no further appeal from these Courts, every prisoner under sentence of death can appeal for remission or commutation of sentence to the Provincial Government and after that to the Governor General in Council or if he wishes, can ask for special leave to appeal to the Privy Council. In these circumstances the rights of a condemned man seem to be very fully safeguarded, and we think that no good purpose would be served by adding yet another Court to which appeals can be brought.

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr Butler Lines 18 and 19 to leave out (and after that to the Governor-General in Council)

The same is agreed to.

It is moved by Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr. Butler / Line 23, at the end to insert ("We should add that at present under the Criminal Procedure Code, a condemned prisoner can apply for commutation of his sentence not only to the provincial Government but also to the Governor-General in Council. We think that under the new Constitution the determination of applications for commutation or remission of sentence under s. 401 of the Code should rest with the authority primarily responsible for the preservation of Law and Order, namely, the provincial Government, and that the Federal Government, that is to say the Governor-General acting on the advice of his Ministers, as the successor of the Governor-General in Council should no longer possess this statutory power of commuting or remitting sentences. At the same time, we are reluctant to diminish the opportunities for appeal which are at present enjoyed under the Indian Law, and we recommend that the power now exercisable in this respect by the Governor-General in Council should henceforth vest in the Governor-General acting in his discretion, to whom, in addition, there will, we assume, be delegated as at present the prerogative power of pardon.")

Then constitution will, as at present, be laid down in the Constitution Act and the appointments to them will remain with the Crown. the Constitution Act will, moreover, itself regulate more precisely than at present the nature and extent of the superintendence to be exercised by a High Court over the Subordinate Courts of the Province—the nature and extent, in fact, of what may be described as their administrative jurisdiction. No change will be made in their relations with the Provinces in regard to the administrative questions affecting their establishment and buildings, except that the Calcutta High Court will henceforth have relations in these respects with the Bengal Government direct and not, as at present, with the Central Government (which, even as matters stand, naturally consults the Bengal Government upon any
